3. He arranged the year according to the bounds (or signs of the Zodiac, Heb. mazzaroth) that he defined.
4. For each of the twelve months three stars he fixed.
5. From the day when the year issues forth unto the close,
6. he established the mansion of the god Nibiru, that they might know their laws (or bonds).
7. That they might not err or deflect at all,
8. the mansion of Bel and Hea he established along with himself.
9. He opened also the great gates in the sides of the world;
10. the bolts he strengthened on the left hand and on the right.
11. In its centre also he made a staircase.
12. The moon-god he caused to beautify the thick night.
13. He appointed him also to hinder (or balance) the night, that the day may be known,
14. (saying): Every month, without break, observe thy circle:
15. at the beginning of the month also, when the night is at its height.
16. (with) the horns thou announcest that the heaven may be known.

17. On the seventh day (thy) circle (begins to) fill,
18. but open in darkness will remain the half on the right (?).[9]
19. At that time the sun (will be) on the horizon of heaven at thy (rising).
20. (Thy form) determine and make a (circle?).
21. (From hence) return (and) approach the path of the sun.
22. (Then) will the darkness return; the sun will change.
23. .... seek its road.
24. (Rise and) set, and judge judgment.

All that is left of the reverse is the latter half of the last line of the narrative, and the colophon, which runs thus:—

..... the gods on his hearing.

Fifth tablet of (the series beginning) At that time above.

Property of Assur-bani-pal king of nations king of Assyria.

This fine fragment is a typical specimen of the style of the whole series, and shows a marked stage in the Creation, the appointment of the heavenly orbs. It parallels the fourth day of Creation in the first chapter of Genesis, where we read: “And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years:

“15. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so.

“16. And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; he made the stars also.

“17. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth, “18. And to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness: and God saw that it was good.

“19. And the evening and morning were the fourth day.”

The fragment of the first tablet of the Creation series was introductory, and dealt with the generation of the gods rather than the creation of the universe, and when we remember that the fifth tablet contains the Creation given in Genesis under the fourth day, while a subsequent tablet, probably the seventh, gives the creation of the animals which, according to Genesis, took place on the sixth day, it would seem that the events of each of the days of Genesis were recorded on a separate tablet, and that the numbers of the tablets generally followed in the same order as the days of Creation in Genesis, thus:

Genesis, Chap. I.

V. 1 & 2 agree with Tablet 1.
V. 3 to 5 1st day probably with tablet 2.
V. 6 to 8 2nd day probably with tablet 3.
V. 9 to 13 3rd day probably with tablet 4.
V. 14 to 19 4th day agree with tablet 5.
V. 20 to 23 5th day probably with tablet 6.
V. 24 & 25 6th day probably with tablet 7.
V. 26 and following, 6th and 7th day, probably with tablet 8.

The assertion with which the fifth tablet begins may be compared with the oft-repeated statement of Genesis, after each act of creative power, that "God saw that it was good." In fact, the difference between the expressions used by the Hebrew and Assyrian writers seems greater than it really is, since the word rendered "to make suitable" comes from a root which signifies "pleasant" or "agreeable." It may be noted that the word yuaddi "he arranged" or "appointed" in the third line has the same root as the Hebrew môădhim, which is used in the same connection Gen. i. 14 in the sense of "seasons."

We next come to the creation of the heavenly orbs, and just as the book of Genesis says they were set for signs and seasons, for days and years, so the inscription describes that the stars were set in courses to define the year. The twelve constellations or signs of the zodiac, and two other bands of constellations are referred to, corresponding with the two sets of twelve stars, one to the north and the other to the south of the zodiac, which according to Diodorus Siculus played a prominent part in Babylonian astronomy.

The god Nibiru appears in the astronomical tablets as one of the stars. Here, however, in the account of the Creation, he seems to be the deity who specially presided over the signs of the zodiac and the course of the year, and in a hymn to the Creator, which will be translated further on, he takes the place of the classical Fate, and determines the laws of the universe generally, and of the stars in particular. It is evident, from the opening of the inscription on the first tablet of the great Chaldean work on astrology and astronomy, that the functions of the stars were according to the Babylonians to act not only as regulators of the seasons and the year, but to be also used as signs, as in Genesis i. 14, for in those ages it was generally believed that the heavenly bodies gave, by their appearance and positions, signs of events which were coming on the earth.

The passage given in the eighth line of the inscription, to the effect that the God who created the stars fixed places or habitations for Bel and Hea with himself in the heavens, points to the fact that Anu, god of the heavens, was considered to be the creator of the heavenly hosts; for it is he who shares with Bel and Hea the divisions of the face of the sky, which was divided into three zones. Summer was the season of Bel, autumn of Anu, and winter of Hea, the season of spring not being recognized by the Babylonians. The new moon also was called Anu for the first five days, Hea for the next five, and Bel for the third.

The ninth line of the tablet gives us an insight into the philosophical beliefs of the early Babylonians. They evidently considered that the world was drawn together out of the waters, and rested or reposed upon a vast abyss of chaotic ocean which filled the space below the world. This dark infernal lake was shut in by gigantic gates and strong fastenings, which prevented the floods from overwhelming the world. In the centre was a staircase which led from the abyss below to the region of light above.

The account then goes on to describe the creation of the moon for the purpose of beautifying the night and regulating the calendar. The phases of the moon are recorded: its commencing as a thin crescent at evening on the first day of the month, and its gradually increasing and travelling further into the night. It will be noticed that it is regarded as appointed, in the language of the Bible, “to divide the day from the night,” and to be for a sign and a season. The expression “judge judgment” may be compared with the expression of Genesis (i. 18.) that the sun and moon were set “to rule over the day and over the night.” An account of the creation of the sun probably followed upon that of the creation of the moon.

The creation of the moon, however, is placed first in accordance with the general views of the Babylonians, who, as was natural in a people of astronomers, honoured the moon above the sun, even making the sun-god the son of the moon-god.

The details of the creation of the planets and stars, which would have been very important to us, are unfortunately lost, no further fragment of this tablet having been recovered.

The colophon at the close of the tablet gives us, however, part of the first line of the sixth tablet, but not enough to determine its subject. It is probable that this dealt with the creation of creatures of the water and fowls of the air, and that these were the creation of Bel, the companion deity to Anu.

The next tablet, the seventh in the series, is probably represented by a curious fragment, which was found by Mr. Smith in one of the trenches at Kouyunjik.

This fragment is like some of the others, the upper portion of a tablet much broken, and only valuable from its generally clear meaning. The translation is as follows:

1. At that time the gods in their assembly created .....
2. They made suitable the strong monsters .....
3. They caused to come living creatures .....
4. cattle of the field, beasts of the field, and creeping things of the field .....
5. They fixed for the living creatures .....
6. ..... cattle and creeping things of the city they fixed .....
7. ..... the assembly of the creeping things, the whole which were created .....

8. ..... which in the assembly of my family ...
9. ..... and the god Nin-si-ku (the lord of noble face) joined the two together .....
10. ..... to the assembly of the creeping things I gave life .....
11. ..... the seed of Lakhamu I destroyed .....

This tablet corresponds with the sixth day of Creation in Genesis (i. 24-25): “And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind: and it was so.

“And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good.”

The Assyrian tablet commences with a statement of the satisfaction a former creation, apparently that of the monsters or whales, had given; here referring to Genesis i. 23. It then goes on to relate the creation of living animals on land, three kinds being distinguished, exactly agreeing with the Genesis account, and then we have in the ninth line a curious reference to the god Nin-si-ku (one of the names of Hea). One of Hea’s titles was “the lord of mankind,” and Sir Henry Rawlinson has endeavoured to show that Eridu, the city of Hea, was identical with the Biblical Garden of Eden. We may here notice a tablet which refers to the creation of man. In this tablet, K 63, the creation of the human race is given to Hea, and all the references in other inscriptions make this his work. As in Genesis, so in these cuneiform tablets the Creator is made to speak and to address the objects which he calls into existence.

The next fragment was supposed by Mr. Smith to relate to the fall of man and to contain the speech of the deity to the newly-created pair. This, however, is extremely doubtful, as will appear from the revised translation below. The fragment is in so broken a condition that almost anything may be made out of it. It is possible that nothing more is intended by it than instructions as to the construction of an image of a household god or spirit and the correct mode of worshipping it.

The next fragment is a small one; it is the lower corner of a tablet with the ends of a few lines. Mr. Smith connected it with the legend of the fall of man, but the mention of the god Sar-tuli-elli, "the king of the illustrious mound," would rather indicate that it has to do with the story of the Tower of Babel. As, however, the fragment is too small and mutilated to decide the question, it has been allowed to remain in the place assigned to it by Mr. Smith, and not transferred to a later chapter.

According to Sir H. Rawlinson, "the holy mound" is now represented by the ruins of Amrán. At any rate, it stood on the site of the Tower of Babel and was dedicated to the god Anu. Along with the adjoining buildings, among which are to be numbered the royal palace and the famous hanging gardens, it formed a particular quarter of Babylon, enclosed within its own wall and known under the name of Su-Anna, the "Valley of Anu," which Sir H. Rawlinson proposes to read Khalannê, and identify with the Calneh of the Old Testament. In support of his reading he refers to the statement of the Septuagint in Isaiah x. 9.: "Have not I taken the region above Babylon and Khalannê, where the tower was built?"

We may conclude this chapter with a fragment of some length, which Mr. Smith erroneously supposed to refer to the Fall. His mistake arose from the imperfect state in which the text of it has been preserved, and the consequent obscurity of its reference and meaning. Dr. Oppert has shown that it really contains a hymn to the Creator Hea. Before the commencement of lines 1, 5, 11, 19, 27, and 29 on the obverse, there are glosses stating that the divine titles commencing these lines all apply to the same deity. These explanatory glosses show that even in the Assyrian time the allusions in the original text were not all intelligible without the help of a commentary.

In a second copy which presents several variations lines 14 to 19 are omitted.

It is evident that this hymn to the Creator emanated from what Sir Henry Rawlinson has termed the monotheistic party among the ancient Babylonians, and that the speech of Hea in lines 14 to 19 has been inserted by a poet who did not belong to it. The various deities of the popular faith are all resolved into the one supreme God, the maker of the world and man, who was worshipped at Babylon under the names of Bel, "the Lord," and Merodach the sun-god, at Eridu under that of Hea and at Nipur under that of Anu. The gods of the multitude are said to be only the fifty names of the Creator. To him is ascribed the regulation of the stars, the naming of the angels, and the subjection of the subordinate demi-gods, and marginal notes expressly state that the several titles under which the Creator is addressed on the obverse of the tablets, all belong to one and the same divinity.

In the popular mythology the part of the Creator was usually assigned to Merodach. Thus we find the latter deity addressed as follows in a mutilated bilingual hymn (K 2962 Obv.):—

1. [King] of the land, lord of the world,
2. ... protector of heaven and earth,

3. firstborn of the god Hea,
4. the restorer of heaven and earth,
5. ... mighty lord of mankind, king of the world.
6. ... the god of gods,
7. (lord) of heaven and earth, who hast no equal,
8. companion of Anu and Bel,
9. the merciful one among the gods,
10. the merciful who raisest the dead to life,
11. Merodach, the king of heaven and earth,
12. the king of Babylon, the lord of Bit-Saggil,
13. the king of Bit-Zida, the lord of the mighty temple of life,
14. heaven and earth are thine,
15. the circuit of heaven and earth is thine,
16. the charm (to produce) life is thine,
17. the philtre of life is thine,
18. the Illustrious King, the mouth of the Abyss, is thine;
19. mankind, (even) the men with the black heads,
20. living creatures, as many as are called by a name, as exist in the land,
21. the four quarters of the world, as many as there are,
22. the angels of the hosts of heaven and earth, as many as there are, (are thine).

In these references to the names of the living creatures made by the Creator at the beginning of the world, we are irresistibly reminded of the passage in Genesis ii. 19., where we read that "out of the ground God formed every beast of the field and every fowl of the air; and brought them to Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof."

One of the most curious statements made in these hymns is that the race of men created by the deity was black-headed. The same race of men is mentioned elsewhere in the ancient literature of the Accadians. Thus in a hymn to the goddess Gula, the goddess is described as "the mother who bore the men of the black heads," and in another hymn the sun-god is declared to "direct the men of the black heads." Sargon of Agané is further described as ruling over "all the men of the black heads," and in imitation of this mode of expression Sennacherib in later days speaks of having overcome "all the black-headed race." The black-headed race of Sennacherib, however, was the Turanian population of Elam and the adjoining districts on the east of Babylonia, whereas it is plain that the Accadian hymns mean by the black-headed race the Accadian people itself. It was over them that Sargon of Agané, the Semite, boasts of having extended his sway, though according to an old geographical list it was Sumer or Shinar rather than Accad, which was inhabited by the people of "the black-face." But after all there is no contradiction between the statements of Sennacherib and of the hymns. The Accadians belonged to the same race as the Turanian inhabitants of Elam, and spoke a similar language to theirs.

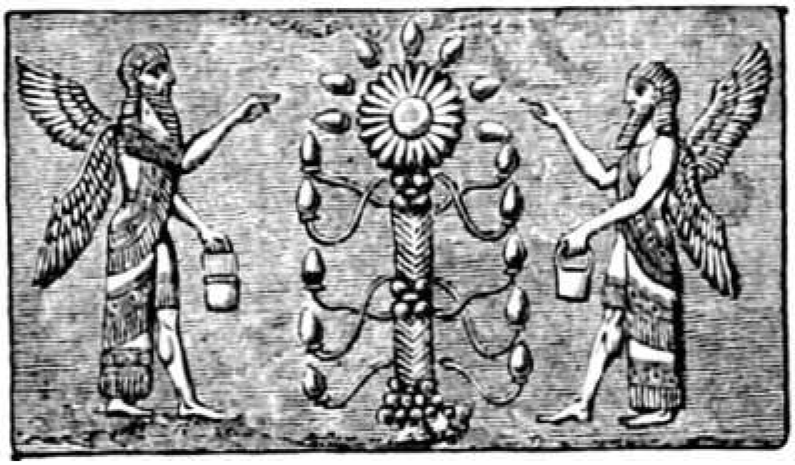
Now we shall find in the account of the exploits of Dibbara, which will be translated in a subsequent chapter, that the black race, which is identified with the Accadians, is contrasted with the people of Syria, while in the bilingual tablets, the black race is similarly contrasted with the white race. Hence it is clear that the white race was the same as the Syrians, and since the Syrians were Semites, the white race must have been synonymous in the language of the Accadians with Semitic. As a matter of fact, the Semites belong to the white-skinned division of mankind, and were accordingly painted yellow by the Egyptians. The Accadian population, on the other hand, belonged to the dark-skinned division, though it is not necessary to suppose them to have been as black as the negro or the "blameless Ethiopian." In the bilingual tablets, the black race is rendered in Assyrian by the word Adamatu or "red-skins."

A popular etymology connected this word Adamatu with the word Adamu or admu, "man," partly on account of the similarity of sound, partly because in the age of Accadian supremacy and literature, the men par excellence, the special human beings made by the Creator, were the dark-skinned race of Accad. The Accadian Adam or "man" was dark; it was only when the culture of the Accadians had been handed on to their Semitic successors that he became fair.

The discovery that the Biblical Adam is identical with the Assyrian Adamu or "man," and that the Assyrian Adamu goes back to the first-created man of Accadian tradition who belonged to the black, that is, to the Accadian race, is due to Sir Henry Rawlinson. He has also suggested that the contrast between the black and the white races, between the Accadian and the Semite, is indicated in the sixth chapter of Genesis, where a contrast is drawn between the daughters of men, or Adamu, and the sons of God. It was owing to the intermarriage of the sons of God with the Adamites that the evils were spread which brought down upon the world the punishment of the Deluge.

It was Sir Henry Rawlinson who further pointed out that the Biblical Gân Eden, or "Garden of Eden," is Gan-Duniyas (also called Gun-duni), a name under which Babylonia is frequently known in the Assyrian inscriptions. Gan-Duniyas signifies "the enclosure" or "fortress of the god Duniyas," a deity whose nature and attributes are still obscure, and who may have been merely a deified monarch of the country. Two of the four rivers of Paradise are the two great rivers that enclose the fruitful plain of Babylonia, the Tigris, and the Euphrates. The Euphrates was called Purrat, or "the curving water" in Accadian from its shape; the Tigris was known under the name of Masgugar, "the current," Tiggar, and Idikna or Idikla, from the latter of which comes the Hiddekhel of Genesis, with prefixed Accadian hid, "river." Gihon is identified with the Arakhtu or Araxes, "the river of Babylon," which flowed westward into the desert of Arabia or Cush, though Sir H. Rawlinson suggests its identity with the modern Jukhá, which runs past the site of Eridu, while Sargon calls Elam the country of "the four rivers."[11]

The tree of life was well known to the Accadians and the Assyrians after them, and the bas-reliefs of Nineveh frequently present us with a representation of it, guarded on either side by a winged cherub who has the head sometimes of a man, sometimes of an eagle. The tree always assumes a conventional form, and since it generally bears fir-cones we may infer that the Accadians brought the tradition of it with them from their original seat in the colder mountainous land of Media, where the fir was plentiful, and identified it with the palm-tree only after their settlement in Chaldea. An old name of Babylon, or of a part of Babylon, was Din-Tir, "the life of the forest," which may possibly have some connection with the tree of life. The special spot, however, in which the site of the tree of life was localized was close to the city of Eridu, now represented by Dhib according to Sir H. Rawlinson, where the solar hero Tammuz was supposed to have received the death-blow which obliged him to spend one half the year in the lower world.



SACRED TREE, OR GROVE, WITH ATTENDANT CHERUBIM, FROM ASSYRIAN CYLINDER.

A fragmentary bilingual hymn speaks thus of the sacred spot, and of the tree of life that grew therein:—

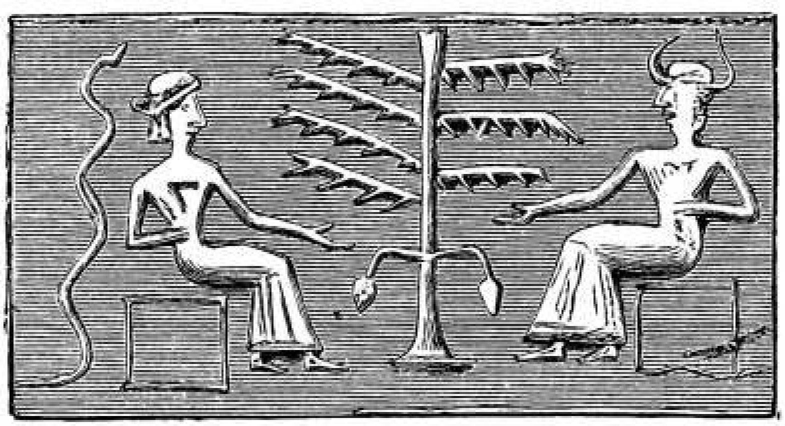
1. In Eridu a dark pine grew, in an illustrious place it was planted.
2. Its (root) was of white crystal which spread towards the deep.
3. The (shrine?) of Hea (was) its pasturage in Eridu, a canal full of (water).
4. Its seat (was) the (central) place of this earth.
5. Its shrine (was) the couch of mother Zicum, (the mother of gods and men).
6. The (roof) of its illustrious temple like a forest spread its shade; there (was) none who within entered.
7. (It was the seat) of the mighty mother (Zicum), the begetter of Anu.

Eridu was the special seat of the worship of Hea, and was often known as “the good city.”

The flaming sword, which according to Genesis guarded the approach to the tree of life is paralleled by the flaming sword of Merodach, which is explained to be the lightning. It was with this sword which is represented on the monuments as having the form of a sickle like the sword of the Greek hero Perseus, that Merodach overthrew the dragon and the powers of darkness. A hymn put into the mouth of Merodach, thus speaks of it:—

The sun of fifty faces, the lofty weapon of my divinity, I bear.

The hero that striketh the mountains, the propitious sun of the morning, that is mine, I bear.
My mighty weapon, which like an orb smites in a circle the corpses of the fighters, I bear.
The striker of mountains, my murderous weapon of Anu, I bear.
The striker of mountains, the fish with seven tails, that is mine, I bear.
The terror of battle, the destroyer of rebel lands, that is mine, I bear.
The defender of conquests, the great sword, the falchion of my divinity, I bear.
That from whose hand the mountain escapes not, the hand of the hero of battle, which is mine, I bear.
The delight (?) of heroes, my spear of battle, (I bear).
My crown which strikes against men, the bow of the lightning, (I bear).
The crusher of the temples of rebel lands, my club and buckler of battle, (I bear).
The lightning of battle, my weapon of fifty heads, (I bear).
The feathered monster of seven heads, like the huge serpent of seven heads, (I bear).
Like the serpent that beats the sea, (which attacks) the foe in the face, the devastator of forceful battle, lord over heaven and earth, the weapon of (seven) heads, (I bear).
That which maketh the light come forth like day, god of the East, my burning power, (I bear).
The establisher of heaven and earth, the fire-god, who has not his rival, (I bear).



Sacred Tree, Seated Figure on each side, and Serpent in background, from an early Babylonian Cylinder.

Allusion is made in this hymn, it will be noticed, to a fabulous serpent with seven heads, which beats the sea into waves. This serpent was originally identical with the dragon of the deep, combated by Merodach, as we shall learn from a fragment to be translated hereafter, that is to say with the principle of chaos and darkness, called Mummu Tiamtu, “the chaos of the deep,” in the account of the creation. It is also described as “the serpent of night,” “the serpent of darkness,” “the wicked serpent,” and “the mightily strong serpent,” epithets which show that it was on the one hand the embodiment of moral evil, and on the other was primitively nothing more than the darkness destroyed by the sun, the bright power of day. It is difficult not to compare the serpent of Genesis with this serpent of Babylonian mythology. No Chaldean legend of the Fall has as yet been found, but when we remember how few Chaldean legends have been discovered, and that even for these we are dependent on the selection and copies of Assyrian scribes, we need not be surprised that such should be the case. The Babylonian colouring of the history in Genesis, the fact that the rivers of Paradise are Babylonian rivers, and that the tree of life was familiar to Babylonian art and tradition, make it probable that we shall yet discover the Chaldean version of the Fall of Man as soon as the libraries of Babylonia have been explored. Indeed, this is made almost certain by the existence of an early Babylonian seal, now in the British Museum, on which a tree is represented with a human figure seated on either side of it, with the hands stretched out towards the fruit, and a serpent standing erect behind one of them. We know that the devices on these early seals were taken from the popular legends and myths. It must be admitted, however, that the two figures seem both to be males.

But if references to the Fall are few and obscure, there can be no doubt that the Sabbath was an Accadian institution, intimately connected with the worship of the seven planets. The astronomical tablets have shown that the seven-day week was of Accadian origin, each day of it being dedicated to the sun, moon, and five planets, and the word Sabbath itself, under the form of Sabattu, was known to the Assyrians, and explained by them as “a day of rest for the heart.” A calendar of Saint’s days for the month of the intercalary Elul makes the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st, and 28th days of the lunar month Sabbaths on which no work was allowed to be done. The Accadian words by which the idea of Sabbath is denoted, literally mean, “a day on which work is unlawful,” and are interpreted in the bilingual tablets as signifying “a day of peace” or “completion of labours.” The calendar lays down the following injunctions to the king for each of these sabbaths:—

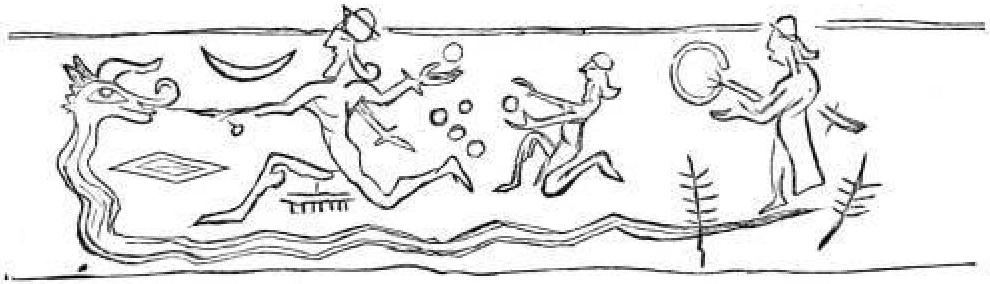
A Sabbath: the prince of many nations the flesh of animals and cooked food may not eat.

The garments of his body he may not change. White robes he may not put on.

Sacrifice he may not offer. The king may not ride in his chariot.

In royal fashion he may not legislate. A review of the army the general may not hold.

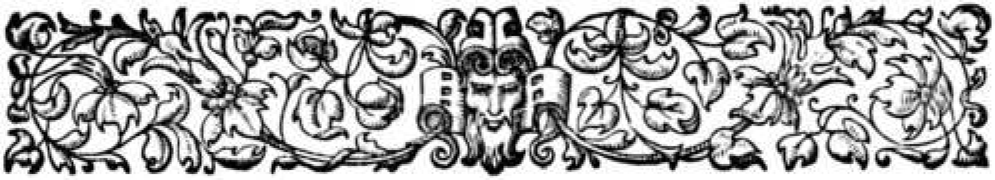
Medicine for his sickness of body he may not apply.



Merodach attacking the Serpent, on an Assyrian Cylinder, in the Possession of Dr. S. Wells Williams, Newhaven.

The antiquity of this text is evident not only from the fact that it has been translated from an Accadian original, but also from the word rendered "prince," which literally means "a shepherd," and takes us back to the early times when the Accadian monarchs still remembered that their predecessors had been only shepherd-chieftains.

Before concluding this chapter, it must be noted that the word translated "the sea," in lines three and seven of the reverse of the hymn to the Creator, is Tiamtu, which, as we have seen, was the name applied to the deep, upon which the Babylonians believed that the earth rested, and out of which it had been brought into existence.



CHAPTER VI.
OTHER BABYLONIAN ACCOUNTS OF THE CREATION.

Cuneiform accounts originally traditions.—Variations.—Account of Berosus.—Tablet from Cutha.—Translation.—Composite animals.—Eagle-headed men.—Seven brothers.—Destruction of men.—Seven wicked spirits.—Mythical explanation of lunar eclipses.—Hymn to the God of Fire.—War in heaven.—Tiamat-Merodach.—The great dragon.—Parallel Biblical account.

THE traditions embodied by Accadians and Assyrians in the literature of which specimens have been given in the preceding chapter, had been handed down by word of mouth through many generations, and committed to writing only at a comparatively late period. When such is the case, traditions are naturally liable to vary, sometimes very widely, according to the period and condition of the country. Thus many different versions of a story arise, and there can be no doubt that this was actually the case with the Creation legends. The account of the Creation in six days was not the only account of the Creation current among the inhabitants of Assyria and Babylonia. It was but one out of many which had slowly grown up among the people, and been finally thrown into a literary form. The story of the Creation transmitted through Berosus (see chapter iii. pp. 34-36), for example, supplies us with an account which differs entirely from the cuneiform account in the last chapter as well as from the Genesis account, and some fragments of tablets from Kouyunjik belonging to the library of Assur-bani-pal give a copy, mutilated as usual, of a third version which has, however, points of agreement with the account of Berosus. This legend, of which the following is a translation, is stated to be copied from a tablet at Cutha.

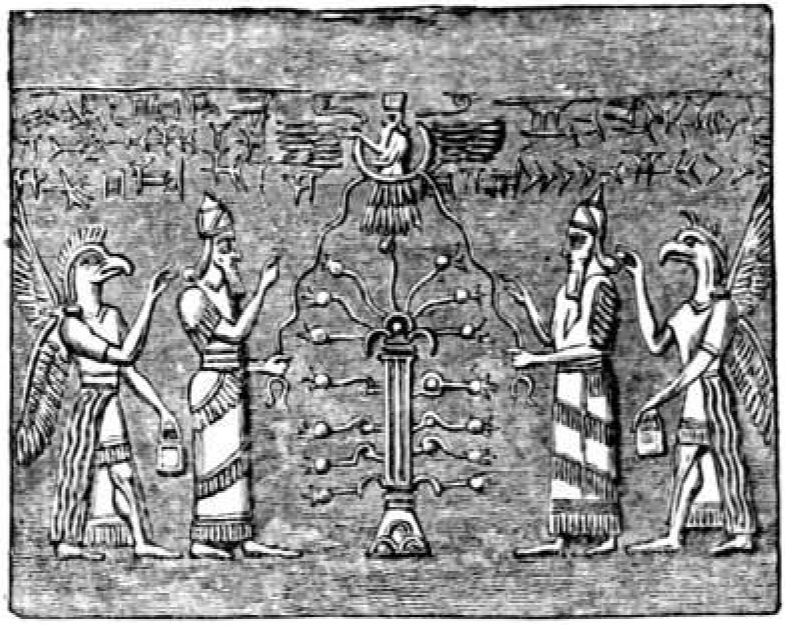
10. Thy foundation may he establish!
11. As for thee, in thy works may he make splendour.
12. Thy forts shall be strong,
13. thy canals shall be full of water,
14. thy papyri, thy corn, thy silver,
15. thy furniture, thy goods,
16. and thy instruments, shall be multiplied.
(A few more mutilated lines.)



SACRED TREE, ATTENDANT FIGURES AND EAGLE-HEADED MEN, FROM THE SEAL OF A SYRIAN CHIEF, NINTH CENTURY B.C.

This is a very obscure inscription, the first column, however, forms part of a relation similar to that of Berosus in his history of the Creation; the beings who were killed by the light, and those with men's heads and bird's bodies, and bird's heads and men's bodies, agree with the composite monsters of Berosus, while the goddess of chaos, Tiamtu, who is over them, is the same as the Thalatth of the Greek writer. It may be remarked that the doctrine of the Greek philosopher, Anaximander, that man has developed out of creatures of various shape, and once like the fish was an inhabitant of the water, is but a reminiscence of the old Babylonian legend.

The relation in the third column of the inscription is difficult, and does not correspond with any known incident. The fourth column contains an address to any future king who should read the inscription which was deposited in the temple of Nergal at Cutha.

It is possible that this legend was supposed to be the work of one of the mythical kings of Chaldea, who describes the condition and history of the world before his time.

The war carried on against the monstrous creations of Tiamtu, described in this myth, was but one version of the war waged against Tiamtu, or Chaos, herself by the sun-god Merodach. The most famous form taken by the story of this war was that which described the attack of the seven wicked spirits, or storm-demons, against the moon, and their final discomfiture by the bright power of day. This attack was a primitive attempt to account for lunar eclipses, dressed up in poetry, and may be compared with the Chinese belief that when the moon is eclipsed it has been devoured by the dragon of night. Similarly the Egyptians told how Set or Typhon pursued the moon, the eye of Horus, how it waned week by week as he struck it, and finally passed into eclipse when he blinded it altogether. According to Hindu legend, the immortal head of the serpent-demon Râhu, cut off by Vishnu who had been informed by the sun and moon of his theft of the drink of immortality, incessantly pursues the two informers in order to devour them, and a Scandinavian myth makes the sun and moon to be always pursued by two wolves, Sköll and Hati, the latter of whom, also called Mânagarmr or dog of the moon, will at the end of the times swallow up the chief luminary of night.

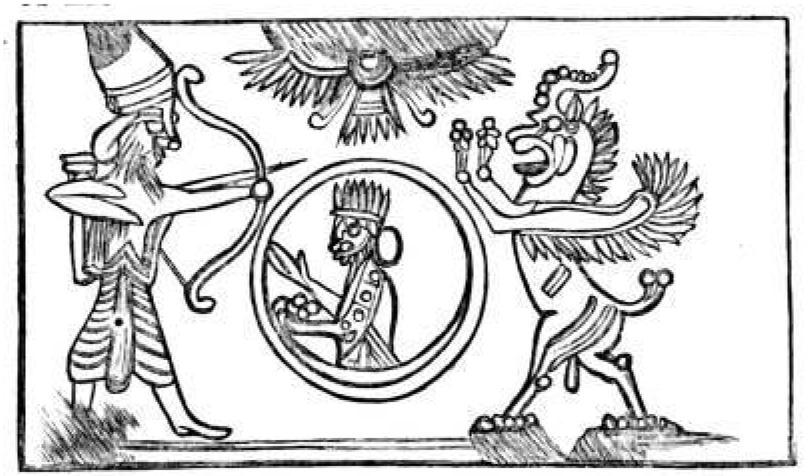
Tablet with the story of the Seven Wicked Spirits.

COLUMN I.

1. The recurring days[12] are the wicked gods.
2. The rebellious spirits, who in the lower part of heaven
3. had been created,
4. wrought their evil work
5. devising with wicked heads (at) sunset;
6. (like) a sea-monster to the river (they marched).
7. Among the seven of them the first was a scorpion (or fiery sting) of rain.
8. The second was a thunderbolt which no man could face.
9. The third was a leopard ....
10. The fourth was a serpent ....
11. The fifth was a watch-dog which (rages) against (his foes).
12. The sixth was a raging tempest which to god and king submits not.
13. The seventh was the messenger of the evil wind which (Anu) made.
14. The seven of them (are) messengers of the god Anu their king.
15. In city after city they set their returning feet.

16. The raging wind which (is) in heaven, fiercely hath been bound to them.
17. The fleecy rain-clouds (are they) which in heaven establish cloudy darkness.
18. The lightning of the tempest, the raging tempests which in the bright day
19. establish gloom, are they.
20. With evil tempest, baleful wind, they began:
21. the storm of Rimmon, that was their might,
22. at the right hand of Rimmon did they march;
23. from the foundations of heaven like lightning (they darted),
24. (like) a sea-monster to the river in front they marched.
25. In the wide heavens the seat of Anu the king
26. with evil purpose did they abide, and a rival they had not.
27. Then Bel of this matter heard and
28. the word sank into his heart.
29. With Hea the supreme adviser of the gods he took counsel, and
30. Sin (the moon), Samas (the sun), and Istar (Venus) in the lower part of heaven to direct it he had appointed.
31. With Anu the lordship of the hosts of heaven he made them share.
32. The three of them, those gods his children,
33. night and day he had established; that they break not apart,
34. he urged them.
35. Then those seven, the evil gods,
36. in the lower part of heaven commencing,
37. before the light of Sin fiercely they came,
38. the hero Samas and Rimmon (the god of the atmosphere) the warrior to their quarters returned and
39. Istar with Anu the king a noble seat
40. chooses and in the government of heaven is glorious.

COLUMN II.

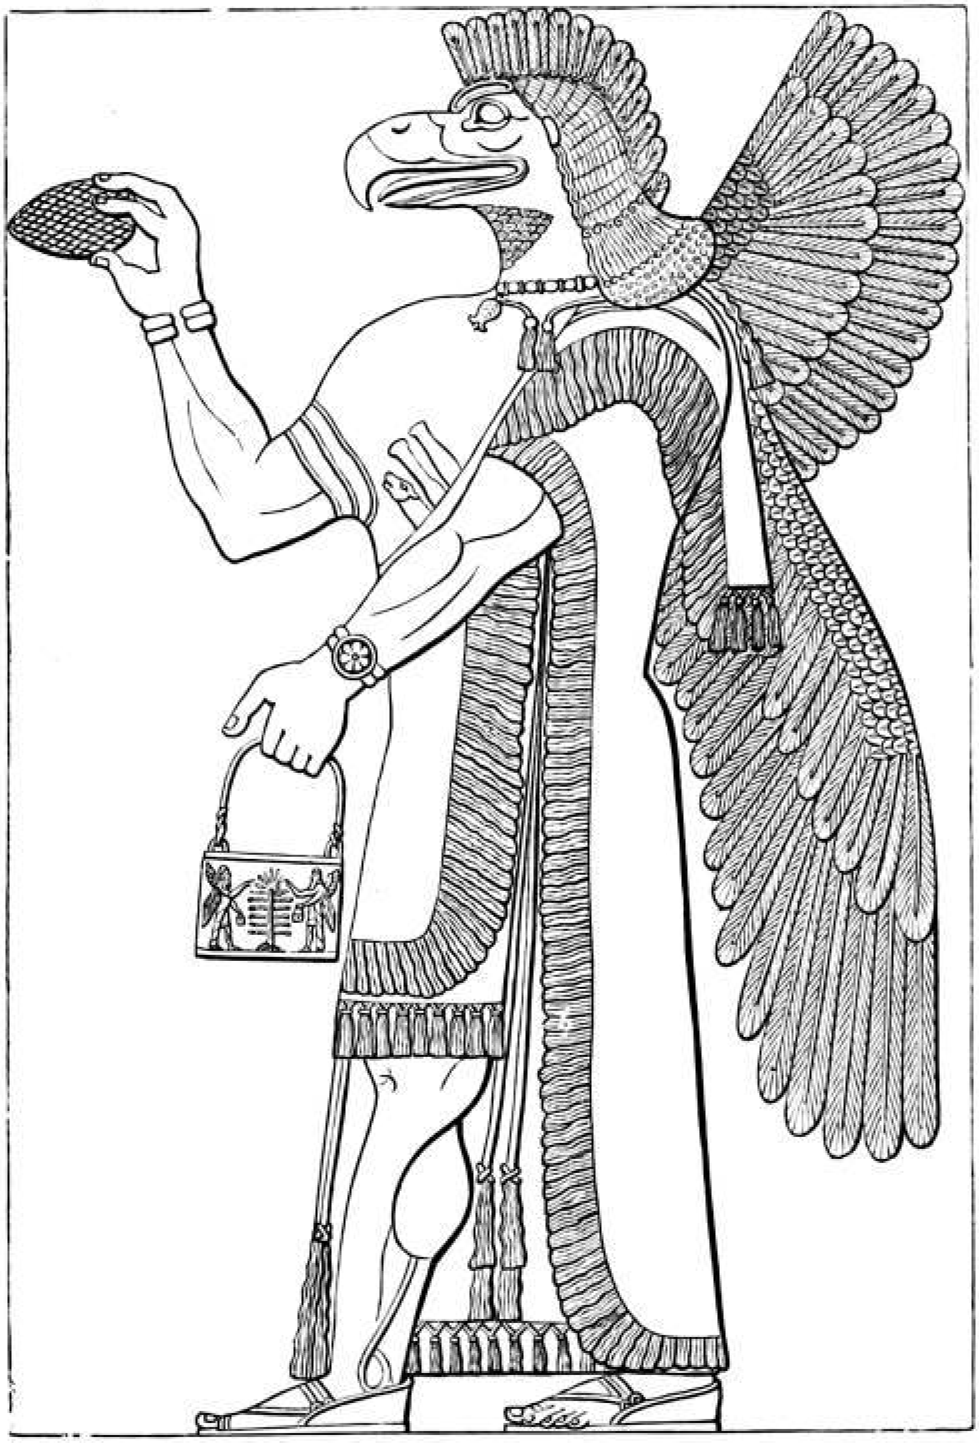


Merodach delivering the Moon-god from the evil spirits; from a Babylonian Cylinder.

The second column, which is much mutilated at the beginning, goes on to describe "the trouble" of the moon-god, how "night and day in eclipse, in the seat of his dominion he sat not." But

1. The wicked gods the messengers of Anu their king
2. devising with wicked heads assisted one another.
3. Evil they plotted together.
4. From the midst of heaven like the wind on mankind they swooped.
5. Bel the eclipse of the hero Sin
6. in heaven saw and
7. the god to his messenger the god Nusku (Nebo) said:
8. "My messenger, Nebo, my word to the deep carry:
9. the news of my son Sin who in heaven is grievously eclipsed
10. to the god Hea in the deep repeat." Then
11. Nebo the word of his lord obeyed, and
12. to Hea in the deep descended and went.
13. To the prince, the supreme councillor, the lord, the lord of mankind,
14. Nebo the message of his lord in that quarter at once repeated.
15. Hea in the deep that message heard, and
28. his lips he bit, and with outcry his mouth he filled.
29. Hea his son the god Merodach called, and the word he spake:
30. "Go, my son Merodach!
31. the light of the sky, my son Sin, whom heaven is grievously eclipsed,

32. (in) his eclipse from heaven is departing.
33. Those seven wicked gods, serpents[13] of death, having no fear,
34. those seven wicked gods, who like a whirlwind
35. (destroy) the life of mankind,
36. against the earth like a storm they come down.
37. In front of the bright one Sin fiercely they came,
38. the hero Samas and Rimmon the warrior, to their quarters (returned),
39. (Istar, with Anu the king, an illustrious seat chooses, and in the dominion of heaven is glorious).



EAGLE-HEADED MAN. FROM NIMROUD SCULPTURE.

Most of the remainder of the legend, consisting of some forty lines, is unfortunately lost, owing to a fracture of the tablet. What is left, however, shows that Merodach, "the brilliance of the sun," for such is the meaning of his name, who always appears in the Accadian hymns as a kind of Babylonian Prometheus and universal benefactor, comes to the help of the "labouring" moon, and "awe" goes before him. Dressed in "glistening armour of unsoiled cloths and broad garments," he enters "the gate of the palace," "a king, the son of his god, who, like the bright one, the moon-god, sustains the life of the land," and there with a helmet of "light like the fire" upon his head, successfully overthrows the seven powers of darkness. The poem concludes with a prayer that they may never descend into the land, and traverse its borders.

In this story, which differs again from all the others, Bel is supposed to place in the heaven the Moon, Sun, and Venus, the representative of the stars. The details have no analogy with the other stories, and this can only be considered a poetical myth of the Creation.

This legend is part of the sixteenth tablet of the series on evil spirits; but the tablet contains other matters as well, the legend apparently being only quoted in it. There is another remarkable legend of the same sort in praise of the fire-god, on another tablet of this series published in "Cuneiform Inscriptions," vol. iv. p. 15. The whole of this series concerns the wanderings of the god Merodach, who goes about the world seeking to remove curses and spells, and in every difficulty applying to his father Hea to learn how to combat the influence of the evil spirits, to whom all misfortunes were attributed.

The seven evil spirits illustrate well the way in which a moral signification may come to be attached to what was originally a purely physical myth. They are frequently mentioned in the literature of ancient Accad. Thus the twenty-third book, on eclipses of the moon, of the great work on astronomy compiled for Sargon of Agané, states that: "When the moon shall describe a section (in) the upper circle (of its revolution), the gods of heaven and earth bring about dearth of men (and) their overthrow; and (there is) eclipse, inundation, sickness, (and) death; the seven great spirits before the moon are broken." Elsewhere, an Accadian hymn, which has an interlinear Assyrian translation attached to it, speaks as follows of these dreaded spirits:—

1. Seven (they) are, seven they (are).
2. In the abyss of the deep seven they (are).

3. The splendours of heaven (are) those seven.
4. In the abyss of the deep, (in) a palace, (was) their growth.
5. Male they (are) not, female they (are) not. [The Accadian text, in accordance with the respect paid to women in Accad, reverses this order.]
6. As for them, the deep (is) their binder.
7. Wife they have not, son is not born to them.
8. Reverence (and) kindness know they not.
9. Prayer and supplication hear they not.
10. (Among) the thorns (?) on the mountain (was) their growth.
11. To Hea are they foes.
12. The throne-bearers of the gods (are) they.
13. Destroying the roads on the paths are they set.
14. Wicked (are) they, wicked (are) they;
15. seven (are) they, seven (are) they, seven twice again (are) they.

Another Accadian poet, who lived at Eridu, the supposed site of Paradise, at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, has left another account of the Seven wicked spirits in the hymn to the fire-god mentioned above. He says of them:—

1. O god of fire, those seven how were they begotten, how grew they up?
2. Those seven in the mountain of the sunset were born;
3. those seven in the mountain of the sunrise grew up.
4. In the deep places of the earth have they their dwelling.
5. In the high places of the earth have they their name.
6. As for them, in heaven and earth wide is their habitation.
7. Among the gods their couch they have not.
8. Their name in heaven (and) earth exists not.
9. Seven they (are); in the mountain of the sunset do they rise.
10. Seven they (are); in the mountain of the sunrise did they set.
11. In the deep places of the earth did they rest their feet.
12. On the high places of the earth do they lift up their head.
13. As for them, goods they know not, in heaven (and) earth are they not learned.

Merodach is then ordered to fetch "the laurel, the baleful tree that breaks in pieces the incubi, the name whereof Hea remembers in his heart, in the mighty enclosure, the girdle of Eridu," in order that the seven evil spirits may be driven away. Can this laurel-tree be the tree of the knowledge of good and evil? It must be remembered that Hea was "the lord of wisdom," and under the form of a fish as Oannes or Hea Khan was supposed to have ascended from the Persian Gulf, and taught the primitive Babylonians the elements of culture and civilization.

At the head of the seven evil spirits stood Tiamtu, the representative of chaos and darkness. One of the most remarkable Babylonian legends yet discovered is one which tells of the primæval struggle between Tiamtu and Merodach, between light and darkness or good and evil, and which does but embody in a new shape the conception which found expression in the myth of the war against the moon. The tablets which contain this legend are unfortunately in a very fragmentary condition.

The first of these is K 4832, too mutilated to translate; it contains speeches of the gods before the war.

The second fragment, K 3473, contains also speeches, and shows the gods preparing for battle. It is so terribly broken that translation is impossible, and all that can be made out is a line here and there.

The third fragment, K 3938, is on the same subject; some lines of this give the following general meaning:—

1. winged thunderbolts ....
2. fear he made to carry ....
3. their sight very great (?) ....
4. their bodies may he destroy and ....
5. he raised; it was suitable, the strong serpent ....
6. Udgallum, Urbat[14] and the god ....
7. days arranged, five (?) ....
8. carrying weapons unyielding ....
9. her breast, her back ....
10. flowing (?) and first ....
11. among the gods collected ....
12. the god Kingu subdued ....

13. marching in front before ....
14. carrying weapons thou ...
15. upon war ....
16. his hand appointed ....

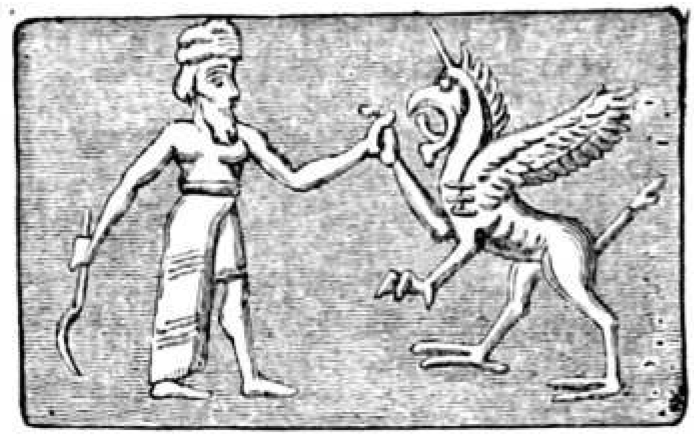
There are many more similar broken lines, and on the other side fragments of a speech by some being who desires Tiamtu to make war.

All these fragments are not sufficiently complete to allow us to translate them with certainty, or even to ascertain their order.

The fourth fragment, K 3449, relates to the making of weapons to arm the god who should meet in war the dragon.

This reads with some doubt on account of its mutilation:

1. The scimitar he had made the gods saw
2. and they saw also the bow how it had been stored up.
3. The work he had wrought (on his shoulder)
4. he raised and Anu in the assembly of the gods
5. kissed the bow; it (he addressed),
6. and he spake of the bow thus (and said)
7. The illustrious wood I have drawn out once and twice,
8. thrice also, her punishment the star of the bow in heaven (shall effect)
9. and I have made (it) the protection (of mankind).
10. From the choice of ....
11. and place his throne ....



Bel encountering the Dragon; from Babylonian Cylinder.

The next fragment or collection of fragments gives the final struggle between Tiamtu and Bel Merodach. The saparu, or sickle-shaped sword, is always represented both in the sculptures and inscriptions as a weapon of Bel Merodach in this war.

Sixth Fragment.

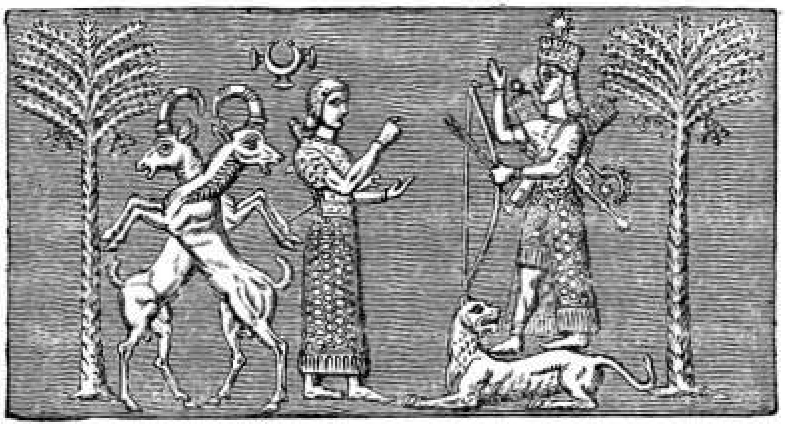
1. .... he fixed it ....
2. the weapon with his right hand he took
3. .... and the quiver from his hand he hung,
4. and he hurled the lightning before him,
5. heat filled his body.
6. He made also the scimitar (to produce) calm in the midst of the sea (Tiamtu).
7. The four winds he imprisoned that they might come forth from its calm,
8. the South, the North, the East, and the West winds.
9. His hand caused the scimitar to approach the bow of his father Anu.
10. He created the evil wind, the hostile wind, the tempest, the storm,
11. the four winds, the seven winds, the whirlwind, the unceasing wind.
12. He sent forth also the winds he had created, seven of them;
13. into the midst of the sea (Tiamtu) they were launched to disturb, they came after him.
14. He lifted up the weapon, the thunderbolt, his mighty weapon;
15. in a chariot that sweeps away all in front, which gives rest, he rode.
16. He fixed it and four yoke-thongs on its pole he hung,
17. .... the unyielding, the overwhelming, he that pursues her.
18. .... with their sting bringing poison
19. .... sweeping away knowledge (?)
20. .... destruction and fighting.

(Several other fragmentary lines.)

Reverse.

1. Unprevailing (is) thy troop; may thy arms strike their bodies!

2. I also stand firm, and with thee make battle.
3. Tiamtu (the sea) on hearing this
4. as before used spells, she changed her resolution.
5. Tiamtu also raised herself; warily she ascended.
6. At the roots fully she grounded (her) foundations.
7. She told over the spell; she determined return (to chaos),
8. and the gods for the war asked for themselves their weapons.
9. Then Tiamtu attacked the prince of the gods, Merodach,
10. who had made charms as for combat for the conflict in battle.
11. Then Bel made sharp his scimitar; he smote her.
12. The evil wind that seizes behind from before him fled.
13. And Tiamtu opened her mouth to swallow him.
14. The evil wind he made to descend so that she could not close her lips;
15. the force of the wind her stomach filled, and
16. she was sickened in heart, and her mouth it distorted.
17. She bit the shaft (of the sword); her stomach failed;[15]
18. her inside it cut asunder, it conquered the heart;
19. it consumed her, and her life it ended.
20. Her death he completed, over her he fixes (it).
21. When Tiamat their leader he had conquered,
22. her ranks he broke, her assembly was scattered;
23. and the gods her helpers who went beside her
24. returned in fear, they fled back behind them.
25. They fled and feared for their life.
26. They are companions in flight, powerless.
27. He trampled on them and their weapons he broke.
28. Like a scimitar are they laid, and as in darkness they sat.
29. (They seek) their quarters, they are full of grief;
30. what was left they take away, they pull back like a rope,



Merodach, or Bel, armed for the Conflict with the Dragon; from Assyrian Cylinder.

31. and elevenfold offspring from fear they produce
32. (Through) the flood the demons go (all of them?).
33. He laid the hostility, his hand ....
34. part of their opposition under him ....
35. and the god Kingu again ....

Again the main difficulty arises from the fragmentary state of the documents, it being impossible even to decide the order of the fragments. It appears, however, that the gods have fashioned for them a scimitar and a bow to fight the dragon Tiamtu, and Anu proclaims great honour (fourth fragment, lines 7 to 11) to any of the gods who will engage in battle with her. Bel or Merodach volunteers, and goes forth armed with these weapons to fight the dragon. Tiamtu is encouraged by one of the gods who has become her husband, and meets Merodach in battle. The description of the fight and the subsequent triumph of the god are very fine, and remarkably curious in their details, but the connection between the fragments is so uncertain at present that it is better to reserve comment upon them until the text is more complete. The scimitar with which Merodach is armed is shown by the cylinders and bas-reliefs to have been of the shape of a sickle, and is therefore the same as the harpê or khereb with which the Greek hero Perseus was armed when he went forth to fight against the dragon of the sea at Joppa. The dragon itself, according to the representations of the monuments, was a composite monster, with the tail, horns, claws, and wings of the mediæval devil. The whole war between the powers of good and evil, chaos and order, finds its parallel in the war between Michael and the dragon in Revelation xii. 7 to 9, where the dragon is called "the great dragon, that old serpent, called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world.” This description is strikingly like the impression gathered from the fragments of the cuneiform story; the dragon Tiamtu who fought against the gods, and whose fate it was to be conquered in a celestial war, closely corresponds in all essential points with the dragon conquered by Michael. That the dragon originally symbolized the sea is one proof out of many that the Accadians were a seafaring people, well acquainted with the terrors of the deep, when the waves conspire with the storm-clouds, those seven evil spirits, to throw all nature once more into its primeval anarchy.

CHAPTER VII.
THE SIN OF THE GOD ZU.

God Zu.—Obscurity of legend.—Translation.—Sin of Zu.—Anger of the gods.—Speeches of Anu to Rimmon.—Rimmon's answer.—Speech of Anu to Nebo.—Answer of Nebo.—Lugal-turda.—Changes to a bird.—The Zu bird.—Bird of prey.—Lugal-turda lord of Amarda.—Prometheus.

AMONG the legends of the gods, companion stories to the accounts of the Creation and Deluge, one of the most curious is the legend of the sin committed by the god Zu.

This legend stands quite alone, its incidents and its principal actor being otherwise almost unknown from cuneiform sources. Only one copy of the story has at present been detected, and this is in so mutilated a condition that it cannot be connected with any other of the legends. It belongs to the same cycle of myths as the myth of the exploits of Dibbara, which will be given in the next chapter.

The principal actor in the legend is a god named Zu, the name being found in all the three cases of an Assyrian noun Zu, Za, and Zi. Analogy would lead us to infer that the name had been borrowed by the Assyrians from the Accadians, as well as the story with which it is connected.

Mr. Smith compared the legend with that of the mutilation of Uranus by his son Kronus, and with the history of the outrage of Ham on his father Noah; but its real analogue is the myth of Prometheus, the benefactor of men, who stole the fire of heaven for their sake, and brought upon himself the anger and punishment of Zeus. It contains two difficult words, partsi and tereti. The first is ambiguous, meaning either "oracles" or "shrines," but since it is coupled with dup-simi, "tablets of destiny," it is probably to be rendered "oracles." Tereti is very obscure. The sun-god is called "the lord of tereti" and the word occurs in the hymn to the Creator, Rev. 17 (p. 79), where also it is united with partsi, "command" or "oracle." It may signify "lots." The tablets of destiny, stolen by Zu, for the benefit, apparently, of mankind, formed the vault of the palace of the under-world. We may compare the books which are to be opened on the day of judgment in Dan. vii. 10, and Rev. xx. 12.

The tablet containing the account of the sin of Zu, K 3454, in the Museum collection, originally contained four columns of text, each column having about sixty lines of writing. The first and fourth columns are almost entirely lost, there not being enough anywhere to translate from. The mutilation of the text seriously adds to the difficulties of translation.

The single fragment preserved, belonging to the first column, mentions some being who was the seed or firstborn of Bel, with a number of titles, such as "warrior, soldier of the temple of Bel," and the name of the god Zu occurs, but not so as to prove these titles to be his.

The following is a partial translation of the remains of this tablet:—

K. 3454.

COLUMN I. lost.

COLUMN II.

1. .... of the gods all of them he urged on.
2. .... the image, Zu grew old (and)
3. Zu? like .... Bel seized his heel.
4. Three streams? of water in front also
5. the work of Bel in .... he dreams of (or ponders) in himself.
6. The crown of his majesty, the clothing of his divinity,
7. the tablets of destiny, himself, Zu, he dreams of, and
8. he dreams that he is the father of the gods also, the protector of heaven and earth.
9. The desire to be Bel is taken in his heart,
10. Zu dreams that he is also the father of the gods, the protector of heaven and earth.
11. The desire to be Bel is taken in his heart:
12. Let me too seize the tablets of destiny of the gods,
13. and the tereti of the gods all of them let me kindle,
14. may my throne also be established, let me lift up the oracles,

15. let me urge on the whole of all of them, even the angels.
16. So he lifted up his heart in opposition,
17. in the lower part of the forest where he was dreaming he kept his head away from the day.
18. When Bel pours out the bright waters,
19. spread out also on the throne his crown was placed,
20. the tablets of doom his hand took,
21. the attributes of Bel he seized, he laid hold of the oracles.
22. Zu fled away and a rugged mountain concealed (him).
23. He spread darkness, and made a commotion (?).
24. The father, their king, the ruler Bel
25. ..... outpoured the glory of the gods.
26. ....
27. Anu his mouth opened, he speaks
28. and says to the gods his sons:
29. Whoever will, let him slay Zu, and
30. among all men may his name be renowned.

31. (To Rimmon) the powerful firstborn the son of Anu
32. his will also to him he declares:
33. To Rimmon the powerful firstborn the son of Anu
34. his will to him he declares.
35. (O mighty) Rimmon, companion, may thy power of fighting never fail.
36. (Slay) Zu with thy weapon.
37. (May thy name) be renowned in the assembly of the great gods,
38. .... a rival have thy brothers
39. may they supply and build of brick (thy) altars,
40. in the four regions may they establish thy stronghold.
41. May thy stronghold be exalted to become a shrine.
42. They shall cry (?) in the presence of the gods and blessed be thy name.
43. Rimmon answered the speech,
44. to his father Anu a word he speaks;
45. My father, to an impenetrable mountain do thou consign (him).
46. Let Zu never associate among the gods thy sons.
47. The tablets of destiny his hand took;

48. the attributes of Bel he seized, laying hold of the oracles,
49. Zu fled away and a rugged mountain concealed (him).
50. .... the opening of (his) mouth
51. .... like mud
52. .... the gods sweep away
53. .... I will not go he said.

(Sixteen lines lost here, part on this column, part on Column III.)

COLUMN III.

1. Zu fled away and a rugged mountain concealed (him).
2. .... the opening of his mouth ... the protector of heaven and earth
3. .... like mud
4. .... the gods sweep away
5. .... I will not go he said.

6. To Nebo the powerful .... the eldest son of Istar,
7. (Anu his will) to him also declares:
8. O mighty Nebo, companion, may thy power of fighting never fail!
9. (Slay) Zu with thy weapon.
10. May (thy name) be renowned in the assembly of the great gods,
11. ..... among the gods thy brothers a rival have (?)
12. May they supply and build (thy) altars;
13. in the four regions may they establish thy stronghold.
14. May thy stronghold be exalted to become a shrine.
15. They shall cry (?) in the presence of the gods and blessed be thy name.
16. Nebo answered the speech,
17. to his father Anu a word he speaks:
18. My father, to a trackless mountain do thou consign him.
19. Let Zu never associate with the gods thy sons.
20. The tablets of destiny his hand took,
21. the attributes of Bel he seized, laying hold of the oracles.
22. Zu fled away and a rugged mountain concealed him.
23. .... the opening of his mouth ... the protector of heaven and earth

The rest, including Column IV., is lost.

Such are the fragments of the story so far as they can be translated at present. The divine Zu here mentioned, whose sin is spoken of, is never counted among the gods, and there would be no clue to his nature were it not for a curious tablet printed in “Cuneiform Inscriptions,” vol. iv. p. 14, which throws light on his origin and character. This tablet gives the following curious relation:

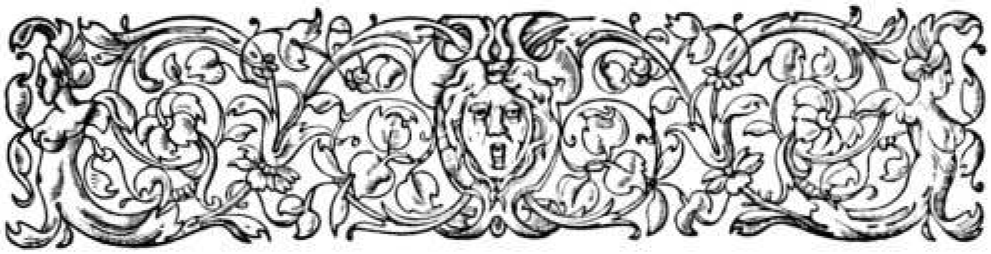
1. The god Lugal-turda (the valiant king) [fled] to the mountains, a place remote;
2. in the mountains of Sabu [he dwelt].
3. No mother gave him life[16] or (suckled him).
4. No father gave him life or with him (associated).
5. No noble who knew him (helped him).
6. Of the resolution of his heart the resolution he (changed) not.
7. In his own heart the resolution (he kept).
8. Into the likeness of a bird was he transformed;
9. into the likeness of the divine storm bird (or Zu bird) was he transformed.
10. The face of his wife who has faced?
11. The wife of the Divine Zu bird, the son of the divine Zu bird,
12. in companionship he made sit.
13. The goddess Enna, the lady of Tigenna,
14. in the mountain he brought back.
15. A woman fashioned was her mother according to likeness made,
16. the goddess of perfumes a woman fashioned was her mother according to likeness made.
17. Her hair was white crystal;
18. Her navel was pure with silver and gold,
19. brightness was fixed in the womb;
20. in the womb dwelt perfection (?).

Many lines are lost here, and the story recommences on reverse.

1. .... a turban he placed on his head
2. (when) from the nest of the god Zu he came.

This Zu bird is plainly the same as the god Zu of the former legend, and his nature is shown by a passage in the annals of Assur-nazir-pal ("Cuneiform Inscriptions," vol. i. p. 22, col. ii. l. 107), who says that his warriors "like the divine Zu bird upon them darted." This bird is called the cloud or storm-bird, the flesh-eating bird, the lion or giant bird, the bird of prey, the bird with sharp beak; and it is not difficult to see what the deified bird really was. It was clearly the storm-cloud, which appears in Aryan folklore under the varying forms of the eagle, the woodpecker, and the robin redbreast, the bird of Thor; while in Chinese mythology the storm-bird is described as "a bird which, in flying, obscures the sun, and of whose quills are made water-tuns." The roc of the "Arabian Nights," with its wings of ten thousand fathoms in width, and its egg, which it was a sin in Aladdin to wish to take from the place where it hung, is but an echo of the Chinese storm-bird; and the identity of the Chaldean Zu with the latter is demonstrated by its Accadian name, which signifies "the bird of the divine storm-cloud." Just as Prometheus brought the lightning from heaven to earth, and suffered the penalty of enchainment to a desert rock, so, too, the storm-bird of Accad stole the secrets of the gods, and was punished by exile from them, and transformation into a bird. When once the storm-cloud had been likened to a bird, it was easy enough to identify it with an actual bird of similar name which swooped upon its prey with sharp beak. That the lightning which darted from the bosom of the black tempest really formed the tablets of destiny was a ready conclusion to a people who read the future in the message sent through the lightning from heaven to earth. Even the Hebrews saw in the thunder "the voice of God." Lugal-turda, it may be added, was the patron of the city of Amarda or Marad, and is said to have been the deity worshipped by Izdubar.

In the story of the offence of Zu there is another instance of the variations which constantly occur in the Assyrian inscriptions with respect to the relationship of the gods. Nebo is usually called son of Merodach, but in this inscription he is called son of Anu. The part that he plays in it is due to the fact that he was identified with the "meridian sun."



Chapter VIII.

THE EXPLOITS OF DIBBARA.

Dibbara.—God of Pestilence.—Itak.—The Plague.—Seven warrior gods.—Destruction of people.—Anu.—Goddess of Karrak.—Speech of Bel.—Sin and destruction of Babylonians.—Samas.—Sin and destruction of Erech.—Istar.—The great god and Duran.—Cutha.—Internal wars.—Itak goes to Syria.—Power and glory of Dibbara.—Song of Dibbara.—Blessings on his worship.—God Ner.—Prayer to arrest the Plague.—Antiquity of the legend.—Itak.

THE tablets recording this story are five in number, but a few fragments only of them have as yet been found. From the indications presented by these fragments the first four tablets seem each to have had four columns of writing, while the fifth tablet was a smaller one of two columns containing the remainder of the story.

The god whose exploits are principally recorded was the leader of the plague-demons, and bears the name of Dibbara. He has the title of "the darkening one," which recalls the passage in Psalm xci. 6, "the pestilence that walketh in darkness."

He has a companion deity named Itak who marches before him, and seven gods who follow him in his destructive course. The latter are the seven evil spirits in a new form.

The point of the story in these tablets appears to be, that the people of the world had offended Anu the god of heaven, and accordingly that deity ordered Dibbara to go forth and strike the people with the pest. It is evident here that exactly the same views prevailed in Babylonia as among the Jews, visitations from pestilence or famine being always supposed to be sent by the deity in punishment for some sin. In fact, the account of the pestilence inflicted upon the Israelites on account of David's sin in numbering the people is a striking parallel to the Accadian legend which follows. The angel of the pestilence seen by David, with his sword drawn, may be compared with Dibbara, the Accadian personification of the pest.

The whole of this series of tablets may be described as a poetical picture of the destruction caused by a plague, sweeping over district after district, and destroying everything before it.

The fragment which appears to come first in the series is a very mutilated portion of a tablet, containing parts of three columns of writing. Only a fragment of the first column is perfect enough to translate, and the characters on this are so worn that the translation cannot be other than doubtful. It seems to read

1. Against the paling he struck and ....
2. the fifth time he smote (?) above and below seeking .....
3. seven ......
4. The words of the account of the seven gods all of them Anu had heard.
5. He .... them also to Dibbara the warrior of the gods: May thy hands go
5(sic.). whenever the people of the nations their shame [or alliance] have destroyed.
7. I have set thy heart also to make darkness.
8. The people of the black heads to ruin thou shalt strike with the desolation of the god Ner;
9. may thy weapons (overthrow) them, and may thy hands go.
10. As for them ..... their weapons.
11. He said to Dibbara: ......

The speech of Anu which follows is written in characters so broken and indistinct as to make any attempt at translation impossible.

The next fragment is of a different character, but appears from its style to belong to the same series.

1. .... he ....
2. .. spake to him and he explained (?) ....
3. .. spake to him and he learned (?) ....
4. Anu at the doing of Hea shouted for joy and ....
5. the gods of heaven and earth as many as exist whosoever thus answered;

6. his command which was like the command of Anu whosoever appointed
7. .... extending from the horizon of heaven to the top of heaven
8. .... he looked and his fear he saw
9. .... Anu who .... over him .... made
10. .... of Hea his calamity (?) made
11. .... a fierce lord to later days to ....
12. .... seed of mankind
13. .... triumphantly the net (?) .. he broke
14. .... to heaven he had ascended, she thus
15. .... 4,021 people he had placed
16. .... the illness which was on the body of the people he had placed
17. .... the illness the goddess of Karrak made to cease.

The next portion of the legend is a considerable part of one of the tablets, probably the fourth, all four columns of writing being represented. There are many curious points in this tablet, beside the special purpose of the legend, such as the peoples enumerated in the fourth column, the action of the gods of the various cities, &c.

COLUMN I.

1. Bel .... his yokes and
2. (in his) heart he says:
3. Dibbara is crouching at his gate, among the corpses of chiefs and slaves;
4. Dibbara is crouching at his gate; thou knowest his seat.

6. their curse art thou.
7. To the floor thou didst trample them and thou didst make a passage,
8. O warrior Dibbara.
9. Thou didst leave the land, thou didst go forth against others;
10. the destruction of the nobles wast thou made, and thou didst descend into the palace.
11. The people also saw thee; their weapons were shattered.
12. The high priest the avenger of Babylon sets his heart,
13. when the ranks of the enemies to spoil he urges on his soldiers.
14. Before the face of the people they did evil.

15. To that city whither I shall send thee, thou a man
16. shalt not fear, shalt not respect a man.
17. Small and great as one man cast down and
18. of that evil race thou shalt not save any one.
19. The collection of the goods of Babylon thou spoilest;
20. the people of the king (which) is gathered together, and entered into the city,
21. shaking the bow, planting the sword (?)
22. of the soldiers the help, the transgression (transgressors) against Anu and Dagon,
23. their weapons thou plantest,
24. their corpses like the pouring down of rain thou dost cast down in the streets of the city,
25. and their treasures (?) thou openest, and dost sweep into the river.
26. The spell Merodach saw and angrily (?) spoke,
27. his heart was taken,
28. an unsparing curse in his mouth was formed,
29. .... the river he did not ....

COLUMN II.

Many lines lost.

1. .... that city which the lord of the earth ...
2. a whirlwind he did not (make) ....
3. without Samas his tower thou crossest, the land thou givest (?)
4. of Erech the seat of Anu and Istar,

7. The Suti (Arab nomads) with the Suti are placed in ....
8. they are slain; the temple of Anu the priests, the festival makers,
9. who, to make the people of Istar worship, their manhood devoted,
10. carrying swords, carrying razors, dupe, and knives,
11. who to rejoice the glory of Istar trusted,
12. O fierce high priest, the bowing-down of the face over them thou hast made.
13. Their foundations also, their shrines ....
14. Istar cried out and was troubled over the city of Erech,

15. the enemy she strikes and like corn on the face of the waters she scatters.
16. Dwelling in his .... Bit-Parra ....
17. ... she rests not from the war.
18. The enemy whom thou hast stricken obeys not ....
19. The great god answered the speech:
20. The city of Duran to streams of blood ....
21. the people who dwell in the midst of it like reeds (are trembling);
22. .... before the waters their alliance ....
23. and ... thou dost not ....
24. to the Suti ....
25. I in my city Duran judge uprightly
26. I do not ....
27. evil (?) I do not give and ....
28. the upright people I leave ....
Five other broken lines.

COLUMN III.

Many lines lost.

1. .... the house he had built ....
2. this he did, and I ....
3. the day he brought me my fate I ....
4. him, his camp (?) also he caused to destroy ..
5. Afterwards may they destroy, and to another
6. O warrior Dibbara, the established also in Gutium,
7. the unestablished also in Gutium,
8. who sin against thee also in Gutium,
9. who do not sin against thee also in Gutium,
10. .... the destroyer (?) of the clothes of the god of Gutium,
11. .... the mover of the head of the king.
Two other mutilated lines.

COLUMN IV.

1. May the planet Mercury cause his splendour to wane;
2. to his resolutions (?) is he bound:

3. he rejoices not the mouth of his (worshippers)
4. who the structure ....
5. to the seat of the king of the gods may he urge and ....
6. The warrior Dibbara heard it also,
7. the word (which) the god Itak spake to him ..
8. and thus spake the warrior Dibbara:
9. Sea against sea, Subartu (Syria) against Subartu, Assyria against Assyria,
10. Elam against Elam,
11. Kossæan against Kossæan,
12. Sutu against Sutu,
13. Gutium against Gutium,
14. Lullubu against Lullubu,
15. country against country, house against house, man against man,
16. brother against brother also, may they destroy each other,
17. and afterwards may Accad come and
18. the whole of them destroy, and fight against them.
19. The warrior Dibbara to Itak who goes before him a word speaks:
20. Go also Itak, in the word thou hast spoken do according to all thy heart.
21. Itak against the land of Khikhi (Phœnicia) set his face,
22. and the seven warrior gods unequalled
23. marched after him.
24. To the country of Khikhi to the mountains the warrior went,
25. his hand he also lifted and destroyed the land,
26. the land of Khikhi he counted as his own country.

The next fragments of the story are on a mutilated copy of the last tablet, K. 1282. This tablet, as has been before stated, is only a smaller supplemental one to include the end of the story, which could not be written on the fourth tablet.

26. That song for ever may they establish and may they fix the part ....
27. may all the world hear, and glorify my heroism;
28. may the men of all nations see, and exalt my name.
Fifth tablet of the exploits of the god (Dibbara).

Here we see a picture of Oriental feeling with reference to natural phenomenon or disaster to mankind. It is supposed that some deity or angel stands with a sword over the devoted people and sweeps them into eternity.

The first fragment shows the anger of Anu at the sin of some doomed race, and his command to Dibbara to take his weapon, slay the people, and desolate the land like the god Ner. This god Ner was one of the mythical kings of Babylon who reigned after the flood, and is mentioned as having a terrible name and being with Etana a dweller in Hades. The allusion to him in this passage seems to imply that he was believed to have once rescued Babylon from a hostile attack.

The next fragment exhibits the goddess of Karrak as healing the illness of some of the people, 4,102 being mentioned as struck with disease.

In the next and largest fragment the story becomes a little more connected; it commences with a description of preparation for battle, and goes on through speeches and actions to describe the course of Dibbara and his plague that he inflicts upon Babylon, and its besiegers where he spares neither chief nor slave, and enters even the palace. It would seem that the sin of the Babylonians arose from the chief priest or governor of the city arming the troops and sending them out to plunder the enemy. For this the plague is sent, and its progress is graphically described. Merodach the special protector of Babylon at last interferes, and the god of pestilence is checked in his course. The next city visited belongs to Samas, being either Larsa, or Sippara, and then the plague reaches Erech. The character of this city is described, the worship of Venus, with her handmaids Samkhati and Kharimati, or "Joy" and "Seduction," the priests and ceremonies, and the progress of the plague over the place. Then the great god the deity of Duran comes forward and pleads for his city, calling to mind its uprightness and justice, and praying for its exemption from the plague.

In the third column mention is made of Gutium, under which name the Accadians designated the whole tract of country which extended from the Tigris to the eastern borders of Media, including the district afterwards known as Assyria. The land of Nizir, in which rose the mountain of Elwend, on the top of which the Accadians supposed the ark to have rested, also formed part of this vast tract. Sir Henry Rawlinson long ago pointed out that Gutium must be the Goyim of the 14th chapter of Genesis, ruled by Tidal, or rather, according to the reading of the Septuagint, Tur-gal "the great Son."

The fourth column next describes a prophecy of Dibbara that there should be internal war among the peoples of the Persian Gulf, of Syria, Assyria, Elam, Gutium, Lullubu and the Kossæans, from all which troubles benefit should come to the Accadians or northern Babylonians. The Kossæans or Cassi inhabited the northern part of Elam, and under Khammuragas conquered Babylonia and founded there a dynasty which lasted a long time. Lullubu lay northward of Mesopotamia and Nizir.

Then according to his wish Dibbara sends the god Itak his servant, with the seven warrior gods, to devastate, and Itak sweeps over the country and destroys it.[17]

The last tablet deals in generalities pointing out the action of Dibbara when his praise was neglected, and telling all the glories and good that should come to those who should celebrate this deity in song. On the spread of a plague it is evident that the Babylonians had no better means of arresting it than to pray and praise the supposed terrible deity of the scourge, that he might sheathe his sword of anger.

The antiquity of the legend is evident from the geographical names which occur in it. A geographical list which seems based on an Accadian original is the only other document which speaks of Phœnicia, or rather a part of Phœnicia, under the name of Khikhi; and the fact that no reference is made to the Hittites shows that the poem is earlier than the sixteenth century B.C., when the Hittites first rose into power in western Asia. Subartu is derived from the Accadian subar "high," applied by the Accadians to the highlands of Aram or Syria.

CHAPTER IX.
BABYLONIAN FABLES.

Fables.—Common in the East.—Description.—Power of speech in animals.—Story of the eagle.—Serpent.—Samas.—The eagle caught.—Eats the serpent.—Anger of Birds.—Etana.—Seven gods.—Third tablet.—Speech of eagle.—Story of the fox.—His cunning.—Judgment of Samas.—His show of sorrow.—His punishment.—Speech of fox.—Fable of the horse and ox.—They consort together.—Speech of the ox.—His good fortune.—Contrast with the horse.—Hunting the ox.—Speech of the horse.—Offers to recount story.—Story of Istar.—Further tablets.

COMBINED with these stories of the gods, traditions of the early history of man, and accounts of the Creation, are fragments of a series in which various animals speak and act. As these resemble the beast-fables of other races, more especially the African, they may be conveniently classed under the general heading of “Fables.” The idea that animals can speak, or have spoken in some former age of the world, even occurs in Genesis, where we have a speaking serpent; in Numbers, where Balaam’s ass reproves his master; and in the stories of Jotham and Joash, where the trees are made to talk; as also in the Izdubar legends, where the trees answer Hea-bani.

Four fables have been preserved among the fragmentary records of Assur-bani-pal’s library.

The first contained at least four tablets each having four columns of writing. Two of the acting animals in it are the eagle and the serpent.

The second is similar in character, the leading animal being the fox or jackal, but there are only four fragments of it; it may belong to the same series as the fable of the eagle.

The third is a single tablet with two columns of writing, and contains a discussion between the horse and ox.

The fourth is a single fragment in which a calf speaks, but there is nothing to show the nature of the story.

I. THE STORY OF THE EAGLE.

This story appears to be the longest and most curious of the fables, but the very mutilated condition of the various fragments gives as usual considerable difficulty in attempting a translation of it. One of the actors in the story is an ancient monarch named Etana, who, like Ner, ruled over Babylon in the mythical period that followed the Deluge, and whose phantom was believed to sit, crowned, on a throne in Hades along with the shades of the other heroes of old time. The story of Etana was supposed to have been written by an early poet named Nis-Sin.

It is impossible to determine the proper order of the fragments of the story owing to their mutilated condition; they must therefore be translated as they come.

The next fragment, K 2606, is curious, as containing an account of some early legendary story in Babylonian history. This tablet formed the third in the series, and from it we gain part of the title of the tablets.

7. in the mouth of Samas the warrior ....
8. the people of the birds ....
9. The eagle his mouth opened and ....
10. Why do I go ....
11. the god Etana his mouth opened and ....

Such are the principal fragments of this curious legend. According to the fragment K 2527, the serpent had committed some sin for which it was condemned by the god Samas to be eaten by the eagle; but the eagle declined the repast.

After this, some one, whose name is lost, baits a trap for the eagle, and the bird going to get the meat, falls into the trap and is caught. Now the eagle is left, until dying for want of food it is glad to eat the serpent, which it takes and tears open. The other birds then interfere, but the tablet is too mutilated to allow us to discover for what purpose.

The other fragments concern the building of some city, Etana being king, and in these relations the eagle again appears; there are seven spirits or angels principal actors in the matter, but the whole story is obscure at present, and a connected plot cannot be made out.

This fable has evidently some direct connection with the mythical history of Babylonia, for Etana is mentioned as an ancient Babylonian monarch in the Izdubar legends. He seems to be the Titan of the Greek writers, who lived after the Deluge and made war against Kronos or Hea shortly after the confusion of tongues. The city built by Etana may be the city mentioned in Gen. xi. 4 as built at the same time as the Tower of Babel. If the Sibyl can be trusted Titan was a contemporary of Prometheus, in whom we may perhaps see the Inninna of the cuneiform inscription. That Etana was closely associated with the story of the Deluge appears plain from the fact that he ruled at Surippak, the home and kingdom of the Chaldean Noah. The legend of Etana seems in the fable to be put into the mouth of the eagle.

II. Story of the Fox.

The next fable, that of the fox, was ascribed to an author called Lal-Merodach, the son of Eri-Turnunna, but the fragments are so disconnected that they must be given without any attempt at arrangement.

2. .... their shepherd was prostrate ....
3. .... let it not be ....
4. .... they guarded and did not throw down his spoil ...

5. ...... the fox in the trap (?) ....

The last fragment is a small scrap, at the end of which the fox petitions Samas to spare him.

The incidental allusions in these fragments show that the fox was even then considered cunning, and the animal in the story was evidently a watery specimen, as he brings tears to his assistance whenever anything is to be gained by it. He had offended Samas by some means and the god sentenced him to death, a sentence which he escaped through powerful pleading on his own behalf.

III. FABLE OF THE HORSE AND OX.

The next fable, that of the horse and the ox, is a single tablet with only two columns of text. The date of the tablet is in the reign of Assur-bani-pal, and there is no statement that it is copied from an earlier text. There are altogether four portions of the text, but only one is perfect enough to be worth translating. This largest fragment, K 3456, contains about one-third of the story.

19. The abundant floods had been dried up, the waters of the canals were reduced,
20. the water-lily had drooped, it was suffering the summer-heat,

Here the ox describes the state of the country during the drought of summer, and makes a league with the horse, apparently for the purpose of sharing with him the same pastures. Most of the speeches, however, made by the two animals are lost or only present in small fragments, and the story recommences on the reverse with the end of a speech from the horse.

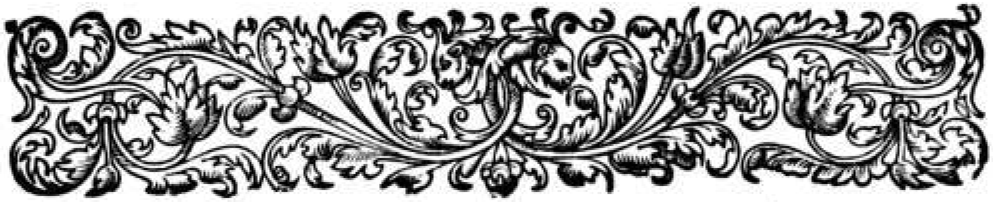
30. The ox opened his mouth and spake and says to (the horse glorious in war) ....
31. In addition to the stories which thou hast told
32. open first (that of) “Behold Istar the noble ....” (Colophon)
Palace of Assur-bani-pal, king of nations, king (of Assyria).

It appears from these fragments that the story described a time when the animals associated together, and the ox and horse fell into a friendly conversation. The ox, commencing the discussion, praised himself; the answer of the horse is lost, but where the story recommences it appears that the ox objects to the horse drawing the chariot from which he himself is hunted, and the horse ultimately offers to tell the ox a story, the ox choosing the story called “Behold Istar,” probably some story of the same character as that of Istar’s descent into Hades.

It is uncertain if any other tablet followed this; it is, however, probable that there was one containing the story told by the horse. Although there is no indication to show the date of this fable, the fact that it is not stated to have been copied from an older document seems to show that it is not earlier than the time of Assur-bani-pal. The loss of the tablet containing the story of Istar, told by the horse to the ox, is unfortunate. The last fable is a mere fragment similar to the others, containing a story in which the calf speaks. There is not enough of it to make it worth translation.



CHAPTER X.
FRAGMENTS OF MISCELLANEOUS TEXTS.

Atarpi.—Punishment of world.—Riddle of wise man.—Nature and universal presence of air.—Sinuri.—Divining by fracture of reed.—The foundling.—Tower of Babel.—Obscurity of legend.—Not noticed by Berosus.—Fragmentary tablet.—Destruction of Tower.—Dispersion.—Site of the Tower.—Meaning of Babel.—Chedor-laomer.—The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

A NUMBER of stories of a similar character to those of Genesis, though not directly connected with the latter, have been included in this chapter, together with two fragments which probably relate, the one to the Tower of Babel, the other to the destruction of the cities of the Plain. The first and principal text is the story of Atarpi, or Atarpi nisu, "Atarpi the man." This story is on a tablet in six columns, and there is only one copy of it. It is terribly mutilated, very little being preserved except Column III., but there are numerous repetitions throughout the text. The inscription has originally been a long one, probably extending to about 400 lines of writing, and the text differs from the generality of these inscriptions, being very obscure and difficult. In consequence of this and other reasons, only an outline of most of the story is given here.

We are first told of a quarrel between a mother named Zibanit and her daughter, and that the mother shuts the door of the house, and turns her daughter adrift, the words of the original being "the mother to the daughter opens not her door." The doings of a man named Zamu have some connection with the affair, his "descending into the street on getting" something being mentioned immediately before the expulsion of the daughter; and at the close we are told of Atarpi, sometimes called Atarpi-nisu, or Atarpi the "man" who had his couch beside the river of the north, and was pious to the gods, but took no notice of these things. When the story next opens, we find the god Bel calling together an assembly of the gods his sons, and relating to them that he is angry at the sin of the world, stating also that he will bring down upon it disease, tempest, distress, madness, burning and sickness. This is followed by the statement that these things came to pass, and Atarpi then invoked his god Hea to remove these evils. For a whole year, it would seem, he interceded for the people, and at last Hea answered, and announced his resolve to destroy the people. After this the story reads:

> 1. (Hea called) his assembly (by the river) of the north; he said to the gods his sons:
> 2. ...... I made them
> 3. .... shall not stretch until before he turns.
> 4. Their famine I observe,
> 5. their shame the woman takes not;
> 6. I will look to judge the people?
> 7. in their stomach let famine dwell,
> 8. above let Rimmon drink up his rain,
> 9. let him drink up below, let not the flood be carried in the canals,
> 10. let it remove from the field its inundations,
> 11. let the corn-god give over increase, let blackness overspread the corn,
> 12. let the plowed fields bring forth thorns,
> 13. let the growth of their fruit perish, let food not come forth from it, let bread not be produced,
> 14. let distress also be spread over the people,
> 15. may favour be shut up, and good not be given.
> ---
> 16. He looked also to judge the people,
> 17. in their stomach dwelt famine,
> 18. above Rimmon drank up his rain,
> 19. he drank it up below, the flood was not carried in the canals,
> 20. it removed from the field its inundations,
> 21. the corn-god gave over increase, blackness spread over the corn,
> 22. the plowed fields brought forth thorns, the growth of their fruit perished,
> 23. food came not forth from it, bread was not produced,
> 24. distress was spread over the people,
> 25. favour was shut up, good was not given.

This will serve to show the style of the tablet. The instrument of punishment was apparently famine from want of rain.

Here the story is again lost, and where it recommences Hea is making a speech, directing another person to cut something into portions, and place seven on each side, and then to build brickwork round them. After this comes a single fragment, the connection of which with the former part is obscure.

1. Seated was the goddess ....
2. to her face also he gave ....

---

3. Anu opened his mouth and speaks; he said to (Nusku);
4. Nusku open thy gate; thy weapons (take)
5. in the assembly of the great gods when ....
6. their speech? ....
7. Anu sent m ....
8. your king sent ....

At present no satisfactory story can be made out of the detached fragments of this tablet, but it evidently belongs to the mythical portion of Babylonian history, and it is impossible not to compare the unsuccessful intercession of the righteous man Atarpi with the pleadings of Abraham on behalf of the cities of the plain.

The next text is a single fragment, K 2407, belonging to a curious story of a wise man who puts a riddle to the gods.

K 2407.

1. The clothing of the god ....
2. What in the house is (fixed) ....
3. What in the secret place is ....
4. what is in the foundation of the house ....
5. what on the floor of the house is fixed, what ...
6. what the lower part ....
7. what by the sides of the house goes down ....

8. what in the ditch of the house broad nigitstsi ....
9. what roars like a bull, what brays like an ass,
10. what flutters like a sail, what bleats like a sheep,
11. what barks like a dog,
12. what growls like a bear,
13. what into the fundament of a man enters, what into the fundament of a woman enters.
14. Then Lugal-girra (Nergal) heard the wise word the son of the people
15. asked, and all the gods he urged (to solve it):
16. Let your solution be produced, that I may bring back your answer.

After this there is a mutilated passage containing the names, titles, and actions of the gods who consider the riddle. It is evident that it is air or wind which the wise man means in his riddle, for this is everywhere, and in its sounds imitates the cries of animals.

Next we have another single fragment about a person named Sinuri, who uses a divining rod to ascertain the meaning of a dream.

1. Sinuri with the cut reed pondered ....
2. with his right hand he broke it, and Sinuri speaks and thus says:
3. Now the plant of Nusku, the shrub? of Samas art thou.
4. Judge, thou judgest (or divinest), divine concerning this dream,
5. which in the evening, at midnight, or in the morning,
6. has come, which thou knowest, but I do not know.
7. If it be good may its good not be lost to me,
8. if it be evil may its evil not happen to me.

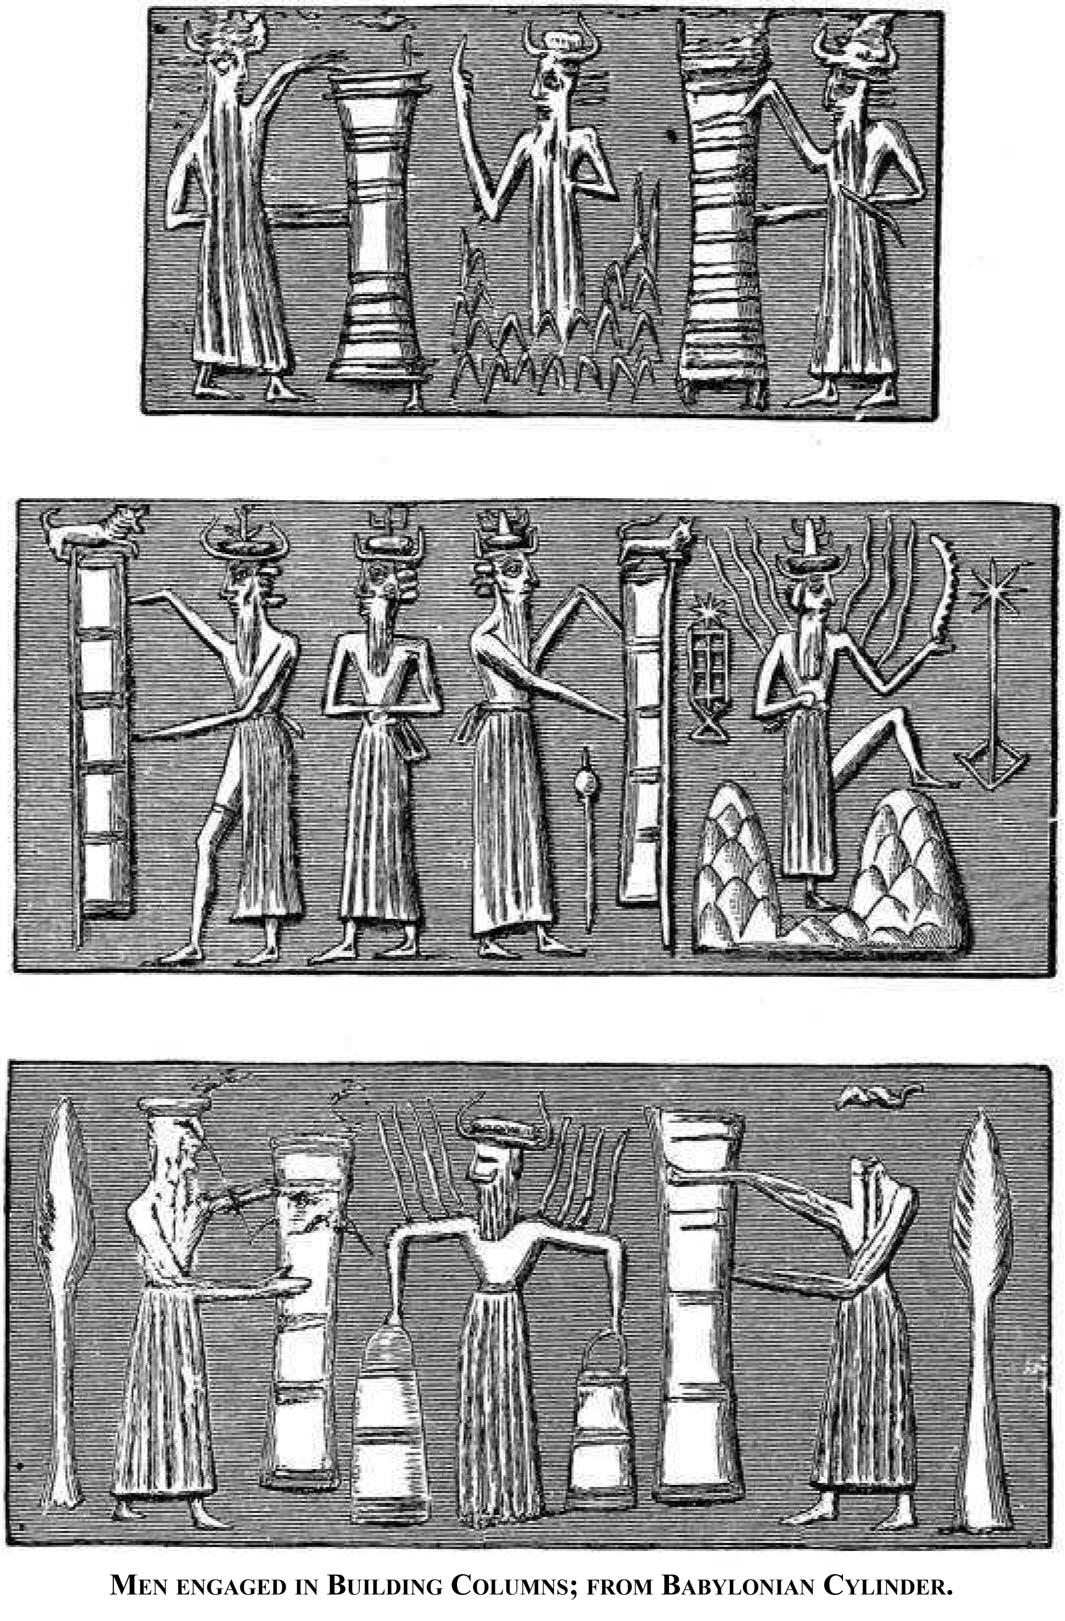
There are some more obscure and broken lines, but no indication as to the story to which it belongs.

A specimen of early Babylonian folklore may fitly be added here. It is a bilingual fragment which treats of a foundling who was picked up in the streets and finally became a great scholar. Unfortunately both the beginning and the end of the story are wanting.

1. He who father and mother had not,

2. who his father (and) his mother knew not,
3. in the gutter (was) his going, in the street (his) entering.
4. From the mouth of the dogs one took him,
5. from the mouth of the ravens one put him away.
6. In the presence of the soothsayer the .... of his mouth one took.
7. The sole of his feet with the seal the soothsayer has marked.
8. To a nurse he gave him.
9. To his nurse for three years, corn, a cradle (?)
10. (and) clothing he guaranteed.
11. Then and ever he hid from him how he was taken (from the streets).
12. His rearer he rooted out (?).
13. The ..... of the milk of mankind he gave him, and
14. as his own son he made him.
15. As his own son he inscribed him.
16. A knowledge of writing he made him possess.
17. For his education (he cared).

One of the most obscure incidents in the Book of Genesis is undoubtedly the building of the Tower of Babel. So far as we can judge from the fragments of his copyists, there was no reference to it in the work of Berosus, and early writers had to quote from writers of more than doubtful authority in order to confirm it.



Men engaged in Building Columns; from Babylonian Cylinder.

There is also no representation on any of the Babylonian gems which can with any certainty be described as belonging to this story. Mr. Smith, however, picked out three from a series of these carvings which he thought might be distorted representations of the event. In these and some others of the same character, figures have their hands on tall piles, as if erecting them; and there is a god always represented near in much the same attitude. There is no proper proportion between the supposed structure and the men, and no stress can consequently be laid on the representations. The Babylonian origin of the story is, however, self-evident. According to Genesis, mankind after the flood travelled from the east, that is from Kharsak-kurra, "the mountain of the East," now Elwend, where the Accadians believed the ark to have rested, to the plain of Shinar or Sumir. Both Alexander Polyhistor and Abydenus state that the building of the Tower of Babel was known to Babylonian history, Babel, in fact, being the native form of the name which the Greeks changed into Babylon. The legend of Etana given in the last chapter seems to imply that the Tower was supposed to have been built under the superintendence of this mythical hero. However that may be, a fragment of the native story of its construction was discovered by Mr. Smith, and though shockingly mutilated, is sufficient to show what the Babylonians themselves believed on the matter.

It is evident from the wording of the fragment that it was preceded by at least one tablet, describing the sin of the people in building the tower. The fragment preserved belongs to a tablet containing from four to six columns of writing, of which portions of four remain. The principal part is the beginning of Column I.

COLUMN I.

1. .... them the father ....
2. the thought of his heart was evil,
3. .... he the father of all the gods had repudiated;
4. the thought of his heart was evil,
5. .... of Babylon he hastens to the submission (?),
6. [small] and great he confounded (on) the mound.
7. .... of Babylon he hastens to the submission,
8. [small] and great he confounded (on) the mound.

9. Their walls all the day he founded;
10. for their destruction (punishment) in the night
11. .... he did not leave a remainder.
12. In his anger also (his) secret counsel he pours out:
13. [to] confound (their) speeches he set his face.
14. He gave the command, he made strange their counsel
15. .... the going he inspected it.
16. .... he took (selected) a shrine.

There is a small fragment of Column II., but the connection with Column I. is not apparent.

COLUMN II.

1. Sar-tuli-elli (the king of the illustrious mound, i.e. Anu) destroys (or punishes).
2. In front had Anu lifted up ....
3. to Bel-esir his father ....

6. In those days also ....
7. he lifted him up ....
8. The goddess Dav-kina ....
9. My son I rise and ....
10. his number(?) ....
11. he did not ....

There is a third portion on the same tablet belonging to a column on the other side, either the third or the fifth.

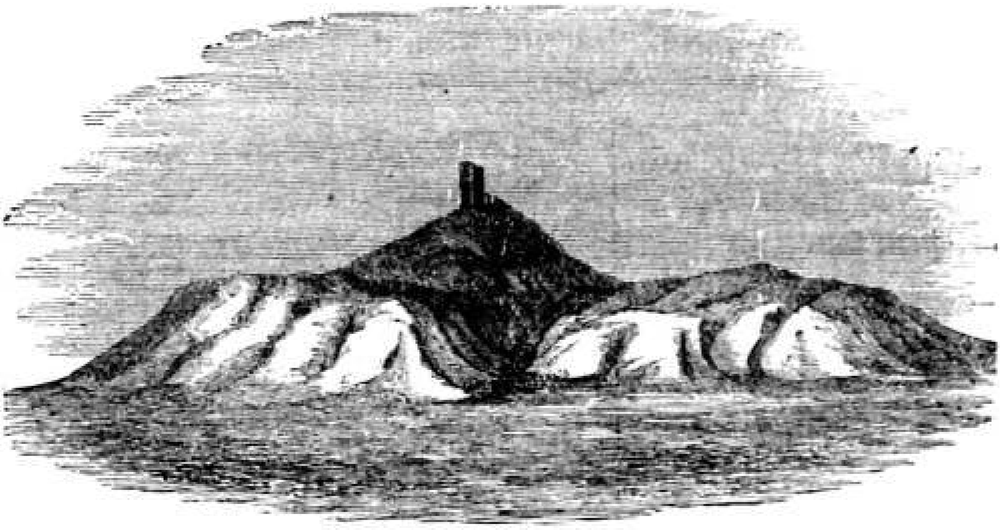
REVERSE COLUMN III. OR V.

1. In ....
2. they blew and ....
3. for future times ....
4. The god of no government went ....
5. He said, like heaven and earth ....
6. his path they went ....

7. fiercely they fronted his presence ....
8. He saw them and the earth ....
9. Since a stop they did not (make) ....
10. of the gods ....
11. the gods they revolted against ....
12. offspring ....
13. They weep hot tears for Babylon;
14. bitterly they wept (for Babylon);
15. their heart also ....

These fragments are so remarkable that it is most unfortunate we have not the remainder of the tablet.

In the first part we have the anger of Bel, the father of the gods, at the sin of those who were building the walls of Babylon and the mound of tower or palace. This mound is termed "the illustrious," and the god Anu who destroyed the builders is accordingly called Sar-tuli-elli, "the king of the illustrious mound." Since the Accadian name of the month Tisri, our October, was "the month of the illustrious mound," it would appear that the construction of it was believed to have taken place at the time of the autumnal equinox. The builders were punished by the deity, and the walls that had been set up in the day were destroyed at night. Prof. Delitzsch has drawn attention to a possible reference to this legend in an Accadian hymn in which the poet says to Merodach, "found during the day, destroy during the night." It is plain from the first lines that the whole attempt was directed against the gods; in fact, that like the giants and Titans in Greek mythology, whose assault on Zeus is probably but an echo of the old Babylonian tale, conveyed to Greece through the hands of the Phœnicians, the builders of the Tower of Babylon intended to scale the sky. They were, however, confounded on the mound, as well as their speech (tammasle). It is interesting to find the very same word signifying "to confound" used in the Babylonian as in the Hebrew account, namely bâlal, or rather bâlâh. We may also notice that the Hebrew writer once (Gen. xi. 7.) adopts the polytheistic language of the Accadian scribe; the Lord being made to say "Let us go down, and there confound their language."



View of the Birs Nimrud, the supposed site of the Tower of Babel.

The last column shows that the winds finally destroyed the impious work of the Babylonians. This fully accords with the legend reported by Alexander Polyhistor. For a time Babylon was given over to the god of lawlessness; but at last the gods repented of the evil they had done, and order was once more restored. The shrine mentioned in the sixteenth line of the first column may receive some light from the fact that the Accadian name of Nisan or March was "the month of the upright altar," or "of the altar of Bel," and that Nisan corresponded with the vernal equinox just as Tisri did with the autumnal equinox.

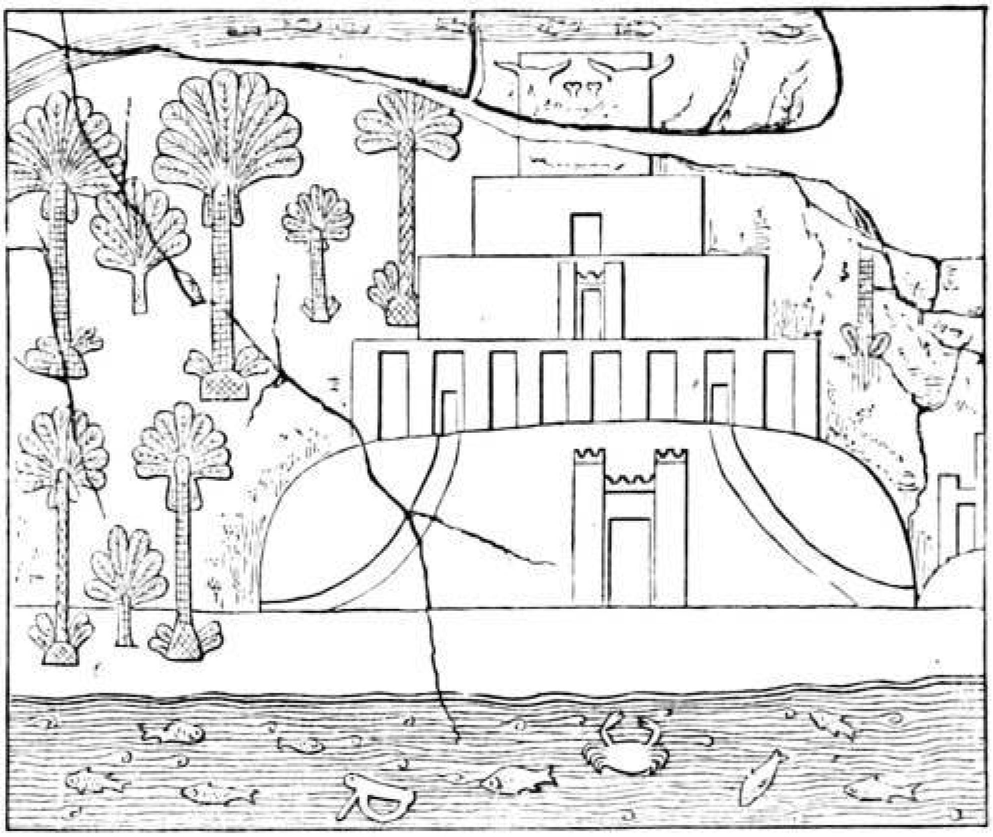
The etymology of the name of Babel from balbel, "to confound," suggested in Genesis is one of those "popular etymologies" or plays on words of which the Old Testament writers are so fond. Thus, for instance, the name of Joseph is connected first with 'âsaph "to take away," and then with yâsaph "to add" (Gen. xxx. 23, 24.), and the name of the Moabite city Dibon is changed into Dimon by Isaiah (xv. 9) to indicate that its "waters shall be full of blood," Hebrew dâm. Babel is the Assyrian Bab-ili "the gate of God" (or, as it is occasionally written in the plural, Bab-ili "Gate of the gods"), which was the Semitic translation of the old Accadian name of the town Ca-dimirra with the same meaning. This is not the only instance in which the original Accadian names of Babylonian cities were literally translated into Semitic Babylonian after the Semitic conquest of the country. It is possible that the name had some reference to the building of the Tower. Babylon was first made a capital by Khammuragas, the leader of the Cossæan dynasty, a position which it never afterwards lost; but the first antediluvian king of Chaldea, Alorus, according to Barosus, was a native of the place.



Tower in Stages, from an Assyrian Bas-relief.

The actual site of the Tower of Babel, beyond the mere fact that it was somewhere in Babylon, has not yet been settled. It is generally considered to be represented by the great pile of Birs Nimrud, which stood in Borsippa, the suburb of Babylon, and was dedicated to Nebo and called "the Temple of the Seven Lights" or planets. This ruin has been examined by Sir Henry Rawlinson; details of his operations here are given in the "Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society," vol. xviii., and Rawlinson's "Ancient Monarchies," p. 544. Sir Henry discovered by excavation that the tower consisted of seven stages of brickwork on an earthen platform, each stage being of a different colour. This is explained by the fact that it was devoted to the seven planets. The height of the earthen platform was not ascertained, but the first stage, which was an exact square, was 272 feet each way, and 26 feet high, the bricks being blackened with bitumen; this stage is supposed to have been dedicated to the planet Saturn. The second stage was a square of 230 feet, 26 feet high, faced with orange-coloured bricks; supposed to have been dedicated to Jupiter. The third stage, 188 feet square, and 26 feet high, faced with red bricks, was probably dedicated to Mars. The fourth stage, 146 feet square, and 15 feet high, was probably dedicated to the Sun, and is thought by Sir H. Rawlinson to have been originally plated with gold. The fifth stage is supposed to have been 104, the sixth 62, and the seventh 20 feet square, but the top was too ruinous to decide these measurements. These stages were probably dedicated to Venus, Mercury, and the Moon. Each stage of the building was not set in the centre of the stage on which it rested, but was placed 30 feet from the front, and 12 feet from the back. The ruin at present rises 154 feet above the level of the plain, and is the most imposing pile in the whole country. According to Nebuchadnezzar it had been built to the height of 42 cubits by "a former king," who however had not completed its summit, and it had long been in a ruinous condition when Nebuchadnezzar undertook to restore and finish it. Prof. Schrader imagines that the long period during which it had remained an unfinished ruin caused the growth of the legend which saw in it a monument of the overthrow of human presumption, the diversity of languages in Babylonia being sufficient to account for the localization of the confusion of tongues in the country.

Sir Henry Rawlinson now proposes to place the Tower or tul ellu at the ruins now called Amrán, within the city of Babylon itself. Here he thinks were the temple of Anu, on the site of the ruined Tower, a chapel dedicated to Nebo, an altar of Merodach, the royal palace (now represented by the mound of the Kasr), and the hanging gardens, all enclosed by a common wall. The quarter of Babylon thus enclosed he would identify with the Calneh of the Bible, principally on the ground that the Septuagint rendering of Isaiah x. 9 is, “Have I not taken the region above Babylon and Chalanne where the tower was built?”

A third site has been claimed for the Tower on the Babil or Mujellibeh mound on the north side of Babylon. This represents the famous temple of Belus or Bel, whose great festival marked the beginning of the year and the vernal equinox. But there is no evidence to support this third opinion.

In the Babylonian and Assyrian sculptures there are occasionally representations of towers similar in style to the supposed Tower of Babel; one of these is given on the stone of Merodach Baladan I., opposite p. 236 of Mr. Smith’s “Assyrian Discoveries;” another occurs on the sculptures at Nineveh, representing the city of Babylon; this tower, however, cannot represent the Borsippa pile, since it consists of only five stages.

Besides the Tower of Babel, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire from heaven may also have been known to the Accadians. We learn from Genesis xiv. that the cities of the plain were among the conquests of Chedor-laomer and his allies, and there is some reason for thinking that the history of Chedor-laomer’s campaign may have been derived from the Babylonian state archives. At all events Amraphel or Amarpel, the king of Sumir, is mentioned first, although Chedor-laomer was the paramount sovereign and the leader of the expedition. The expedition must have taken place during the period when, as we learn from the inscriptions, Babylonia was subject to the monarchs of Elam, though subordinate princes were ruling over the states into which it was divided at the time. Though the name of Chedor-laomer has not been found, Laomer or Lagamar appears as an Elamite god, and several of the Elamite kings bore names compounded with Kudur “a servant,” as Kudur-Nankhunte, “the servant of the god Nankhunte,” Kudur-Mabug, “the servant of Mabug,” and the like. Arioch, king of Ellasar, which probably stands for al Larsa, “the city of Larsa,” has the same name as Eri-Acu (“the servant of the moon-god”), the son of the Elamite monarch Kudur-Mabug, who reigned over Larsa during his father’s lifetime, and was eventually overthrown by the Cossæan conqueror Khammuragas.

The text which perhaps relates to the destruction of the guilty cities is a bilingual one, much mutilated, and runs as follows:—

> 1. An overthrow came from the midst of the deep (the waters above the firmament).
> 2. The fated punishment from the midst of heaven descended.
> 3. A storm like a plummet the earth (overwhelmed).
> 4. Towards the four winds the destroying flood like fire burnt.
> 5. The inhabitants of the city it had caused to be tormented; their bodies it consumed.
> 6. In city and country it spread death, and the flames as they rose overthrew.
> 7. Freeman and slave were equal, and the high places it filled.
> 8. In heaven and earth like a thunderstorm it had rained; a prey it made.
> 9. To a place of refuge the gods hastened, and in a throng collected.
> 10. Its mighty (onset) they fled from, and like a garment it concealed (the guilty).
> 11. They (feared), and death (overtook them).
> 12. (Their) feet and hands (it embraced).
> 13. ....
> 14. Their body it consumed.
> 15. ..... as for the city, its foundations it defiled.
> 16. .... with (glory?) and breadth his mouth he filled.
> 17. This man the voice (of the thunder) called; the thunderbolt descended;
> 18. during the day it flashed; grievously (it fell).

Here the fragment breaks off. It is possible that the person referred to in line 17 was the pious man who like Lot escaped the destruction that befell his neighbours.

CHAPTER XI.

THE IZDUBAR LEGENDS.

Izdubar.—Meaning of the name.—A solar hero.—Prototype of Herakles.—Age of Legends.—Babylonian cylinders.—Notices of Izdubar.—Surippak.—Ark City.—Twelve tablets.—Extent of Legends.—Description.—Introduction.—Meeting of Hea-bani and Izdubar.—Destruction of tyrant Khumbaba.—Adventures of Istar.—Illness and wanderings of Izdubar.—Description of Deluge and conclusion.—First Tablet.—Kingdom of Nimrod.—Traditions.—Identifications.—Translation.—Elamite conquest—Dates.

WE now come to the great Epic of early Chaldea, first discovered by Mr. Smith in 1872. The hero of this Epic is provisionally called Izdubar, though this is certainly not the right reading of his name. The first and last characters which compose it together form a compound ideograph signifying "fire," and pronounced gibil in Accadian, isatu in Assyrian, while the middle character, dhu or dhun, meant "a mass" or "a going." "A mass of fire" would have been by no means an inappropriate name for a hero, who, as we shall see, was originally the Accadian fire-god, and then a personified form of the sun-god. The two last characters of the name, however, when used as a compound ideograph, denoted "the under-lip," and the first character symbolizes "wood."

Mr. Smith believed that Izdubar was the Biblical Nimrod, and was almost inclined to think that this was the way in which the name ought to be phonetically rendered. One passage, however, in which the last syllable is followed by the syllable ra seems to imply that the final letter was r.

The originally solar character of the hero was still remembered at the time when the great Epic of the Accadians was put together. As was pointed out by Sir Henry Rawlinson shortly after Mr. Smith's first discovery of it, it is arranged upon an astronomical principle, its twelve books or tablets corresponding with the twelve signs of the Zodiac, through which the sun passes in his yearly course. Thus the eleventh tablet, which contains the episode of the Deluge, answers to Aquarius the eleventh sign of the Zodiac, and the eleventh month of the Accadian year called “the rainy;” and the sixth tablet, describing his courtship by Istar, answers to Virgo the sixth sign of the Zodiac, and the sixth Accadian month called that “of the errand of Istar.” It is in the second month, that of “the directing bull,” and under the sign of Taurus, that Hea-bani, half-man, half-bull, is brought to Izdubar in the second tablet; the lion is slain by Izdubar under the Zodiacal Leo, and the lamentation he makes over the corpse of his friend and seer Hea-bani is made in “the dark month” of Adar, as it was termed, at the end of the year. Like the autumnal sun, too, Izdubar sickens in the eighth book corresponding with the month of October, and only recovers his health and brilliance after bathing in the waters of the eastern ocean at the beginning of the new year.

If anything were needed to confirm the solar character of Izdubar and his history, it would be afforded by a comparison with the legends of the Greek solar hero, Herakles. Like much else of Greek mythology, the twelve adventures of Herakles were brought to Greece from Babylonia through the hands of the Phœnicians, and it has long been recognized that Herakles is but a form of Baal Melkarth, the sun-god of Tyre. Hea-bani reappears in Cheiron, the centaur, the friend and instructor of Herakles, and just as Hea-bani was created by Hea, Cheiron was said to be the son of Kronos, who is identified by Berosus with Hea in the account of the Deluge. The lion slain by Izdubar is the lion of Nemea slain by Herakles; the winged bull made by Anu is the famous bull of Krete; the tyrant Khumbaba is the tyrant Geryon; the gems borne by the trees of the forest beyond the gateway of the sun are the apples of the Hesperides; and the deadly sickness of Izdubar himself is but the fever of Herakles, caused by the poisoned tunic of Nessus.

A very slight inspection of the Epic is sufficient to show that it has been pieced together out of a number of previously existing and independent materials. Thus the history of the Deluge, which is itself but an episode somewhat violently foisted into the legend of Izdubar in order to preserve the astronomical arrangement of the Epic, may be shown to have consisted of at least two older poems on the subject; and a careful examination of other portions of the Epic brings the same fact to light elsewhere.

As, however, there is clear proof that the Epic was originally composed in Accadian, our present text being merely the Semitic translation of the Accadian original, it must have existed in the form in which we now have it before the age of Sargon and the extinction of the Accadian language in Chaldea. We shall not be far wrong, therefore, in ascribing its composition to about B.C. 2000, or a little earlier. The older lays or poems out of which it was formed must therefore date before this period. There seems to have been a considerable number of them, each incident in the cycle of ancient Accadian mythology having been the subject of various poems. Many of these originated in different parts of the country, so that a long period of time must be allowed for their growth and subsequent reduction to a literary form. But as the legends they celebrated were traditions in the country before they were embodied in poems and committed to writing, we must go back to quite a remote epoch for their first starting-point.

The earliest evidence we have of them is in the carvings on early Babylonian cylindrical seals. Among the earliest known devices on these seals we have scenes from the legends of Izdubar, and from the story of the Creation. The seals mostly belong to the age of the kings of Ur, and some of them are a good deal older than B.C. 2000. The principal incidents represented on them are the struggles of Izdubar and his companion Hea-bani with the lion and the bull, the journey of Izdubar in search of Xisuthrus, Noah or Xisuthrus in his ark, and the war between Tiamtu the sea-dragon and the god Merodach. There is a fragment of a document in the British Museum which claims to be copied from an omen tablet belonging to the time of Izdubar himself, but it is probably not earlier than B.C. 1600, when many similar tablets were written.

There is an incidental notice of the ship or ark of "the god Izdubar" in a tablet printed in "Cuneiform Inscriptions," vol. ii. p. 46. He is here called "the king who bears the sceptre." This tablet, which contains lists of wooden objects, was written in the time of Assur-bani-pal, but is copied from an original, which must have been written at least eighteen hundred years before the Christian era. The geographical notices on this tablet suit the period before the rise of Babylon. Surippak is called in it the ship or ark city, this name forming another reference to the Flood legends. Izdubar is also mentioned in a series of tablets relating to witchcraft, and on a tablet containing prayers to him as a god; this last showing that he was deified, which, however, was an honour also given to several Babylonian kings.

As already stated, the legends of Izdubar are inscribed on twelve tablets, of which there are remains of at least four editions. All the tablets are in fragments, and none of them are complete; but it is a fortunate circumstance that the most perfect tablet is the eleventh, which describes the Deluge, this being the most important of the series. In the first chapter the successive steps in the discovery of these legends have been already described, and we may now therefore pass on to the description and translation of the various fragments. All the fragments of our present copies belong to the reign of Assur-bani-pal, king of Assyria, in the seventh century B.C. From the mutilated condition of many of them it is impossible at present to gain an accurate idea of the whole scope of the legends, and many parts which are lost have to be supplied by conjecture; the order even of some of the tablets cannot be determined, and it is uncertain if we have fragments of the whole twelve in what follows. Mr. Smith has, however, conjecturally divided the fragments into groups corresponding roughly with the subjects of the tablets. Each tablet when complete contained six columns of writing, and each column had generally from forty to fifty lines of writing, there being in all about 3,000 lines of cuneiform text. The divisions adopted by Mr. Smith will be seen by the following summary, which exhibits our present knowledge of the fragments.

Part I.—Introduction.

Tablet I.—Number of lines uncertain, probably about 240. First column initial line preserved, second column lost, third column twenty-six lines preserved, fourth column doubtful fragment inserted, fifth and sixth columns lost.

Probable subjects: conquest of Babylonia by the Elamites, birth and parentage of Izdubar.

Part II.—Meeting of Hea-bani and Izdubar.

Tablet II.—Number of lines uncertain, probably about 240. First and second columns lost, third and fourth columns about half-preserved, fifth and sixth columns lost.

Tablet III.—Number of lines about 270. First column fourteen lines preserved, second, third, fourth, and fifth columns nearly perfect, sixth column a fragment.

Probable subjects: dream of Izdubar, Hea-bani invited comes to Erech, and explains the dream.

Part III.—Destruction of the tyrant Khumbaba.

Tablet IV.—Number of lines probably about 260. About one-third of first, second, and third columns, doubtful fragments of fourth, fifth, and sixth columns.

Tablet V.—Number of lines about 260. Most of first column, and part of second column preserved, third, fourth, and fifth columns lost, fragment of sixth column.

Probable subjects: contests with wild animals, Izdubar and Hea-bani slay the tyrant Khumbaba.

Part IV.—Adventures of Istar.

Tablet VI.—Number of lines about 210. Most of first column preserved, second column nearly perfect, third and fourth columns partly preserved, fifth and sixth columns nearly perfect.

Tablet VII.—Number of lines probably about 240. First line of first column preserved, second column lost, third and fourth column partly preserved, fifth and sixth columns conjecturally restored from tablet of descent of Istar into Hades.

Probable subjects: Istar loves Izdubar, her amours, her ascent to heaven, destruction of her bull, her descent to Hades.

Part V.—Illness and wanderings of Izdubar.

Tablet VIII.—Number of lines probably about 270. Conjectured fragments of first, second, and third columns, fourth and fifth columns lost, conjectured fragments of sixth column.

Tablet IX.—Number of lines about 190. Portions of all six columns preserved.

Tablet X.—Number of lines about 270. Portions of all six columns preserved.

Probable subjects: discourse to trees, dreams, illness of Izdubar, death of Hea-bani, wanderings of Izdubar in search of the hero of the Deluge.

Part VI.—Description of Deluge, and conclusion.

Tablet XI.—Number of lines 294. All six columns nearly perfect.

Tablet XII.—Number of lines about 200. Portions of first four columns preserved, two lines of fifth column, sixth column perfect.

Probable subjects: description of Deluge, cure of Izdubar, his lamentation over Hea-bani.

TABLET I.

After the heading and opening line there is a considerable blank in the story, two columns of writing being entirely lost. It is probable that this part contained the account of the parentage and previous history of Izdubar, forming the introduction to the story. In the subsequent portions of the history there is very little information to supply the loss of this part of the inscription; but it appears that the mother of Izdubar was named Dannat, which signifies "the powerful lady." His father is not named in any of our present fragments, but he is referred to in the third tablet. He was no doubt a deity, possibly the Sun-god, who is supposed to interfere very much in his behalf. When Izdubar, the old god of fire, after first becoming a form of the solar deity, was finally personified and regarded as a mighty leader, strong in war and hunting, he was turned into a giant, one of the mythical monarchs who had ruled in Babylonia in long-past days, and had subdued the many petty kingdoms into which the valley of the Euphrates was then divided.

The centre of the empire of Izdubar is laid in the region of Shinar, or Sumir, Erech "the lofty" being the chief seat of his power, and thus agrees with the site of the kingdom of Nimrod, according to Genesis x. 8, 9, 10, where we read: "And Cush begat Nimrod: he began to be a mighty one in the earth. He was a mighty hunter before the Lord: wherefore it is said, even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord. And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar." We cannot overlook the fact that the character of Izdubar as hunter, leader, and king, corresponds with that of Nimrod. Cush, the father of Nimrod, may be identified with Cusu, Cusi or Cus, the Accadian deity of sunset and night. The word in Accadian signified "rest" and "darkness," and is translated by the Assyrian nakhu "to rest," and nukhu or nukh "rest." This latter word is identical with the Biblical Noah. It is very possible, therefore, that Cush, the father of Nimrod, has nothing to do with Cush or Ethiopia, the son of Ham, the two being set side by side in Genesis merely on account of the similarity of their names. In this case all the ethnological difficulties occasioned by the belief that the Accadians of Babylonia were Cushites, and connected with Egypt or Ethiopia, will be avoided. It is curious to find the Christian writers identifying Nimrod with Evechous, the first king of Babylon, according to Berosus, after the flood.

The next passage in Genesis after the one describing Nimrod's dominion may also refer to Nimrod, if we read with the margin, "Out of that land he went forth to Assyria," instead of "Out of that land went forth Assur." These verses will then read (Genesis x. 11, 12): "Out of that land he went forth to Assyria, and builded Nineveh, and the suburbs of the city, and Calah, and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah: the same is a great city." It must be remembered, however, that Assur was regarded by the Assyrians as their supreme god and eponymous founder, and that in Micah v. 6, "the land of Assur" and "the land of Nimrod" seem to be contrasted with one another. But it is possible to consider the two expressions in the latter passage to be both applied to the same country.

After the date of the later books of the Old Testament we know nothing of Nimrod for some time; it is probable that he was fully mentioned by Berosus in his history, but his account of the giant hunter has been lost. The reason of this appears to be, that a belief had grown up among early Christian writers that the Biblical Nimrod was the first king of Babylonia after the Flood, and looking at the list of Berosus they found that after the Flood according to him Evechous first reigned in Babylonia, and at once assumed that the Evechous of Berosus was the Nimrod of the Bible; but as Evechous has given to him the extravagant reign of four ners or 2,400 years, and his son and successor, Chomasbelus, four ners and five sosses, or 2,700 years, this identification gives little hope of our finding an historical Nimrod.

It is possible that this identification of Nimrod with Evechous, made by the early chronologists, has caused them to overlook his name and true epoch in the list of Berosus, and has thus lost to us his position in the series of Babylonian sovereigns.

Belonging to the first centuries of the Christian era are the works of various Jewish and Christian writers, who have made us familiar with a number of later traditions concerning Nimrod. Josephus declares that he was a prime mover in building the Tower of Babel, an enemy of God, and that he reigned at Babylon during the dispersion. Later writers make him a contemporary with Abraham, the inventor of idol worship, and a furious worshipper of fire. At the city of Orfa, in Syria, he is said to have cast Abraham into a burning fiery furnace because he would not bow down to his idols. These legends have been taken up by the Arabs, and although his history has been lost and replaced by absurd and worthless stories, Nimrod still remains the most prominent name in the traditions of the country; everything good or evil is attributed to him, and the most important ruins are even now called after his name. From the time of the early Christian writers down to to-day, men have been busy framing systems of general chronology, and since Nimrod was always known as a famous sovereign it was necessary to find a definite place for him in each chronological scheme. Africanus and Eusebius held that he was the Evechous of Berosus, and reigned first after the Flood. Moses of Khorene identified him with Bel, the great god of Babylon; and he is said to have extended his dominions to the foot of the Armenian mountains, falling in battle there when attempting to enforce his authority over Haic, king of Armenia. Other writers identified Nimrod with Ninus, the mythical founder of the city of Nineveh. These remained the principal identifications before modern research took up the matter; but so wide a door was open to conjecture, that one writer actually identified Nimrod with the Alorus of Berosus, the first king of Babylonia before the Flood.

One of the most curious theories about Nimrod, suggested in modern times, was grounded on the "Book of Nabatean Agriculture." This work is a comparatively modern forgery, pretending to be a literary production of the early Chaldean period. In this work Nimrod heads a list of Babylonian kings called Canaanite, and a writer in the "Journal of Sacred Literature" has argued with considerable force in favour of these Canaanites being the Arabs of Berosus, who reigned about B.C. 1550 to 1300. The southern half of Arabia is known as Cush in the Old Testament like the opposite coast of Africa, and, as Nimrod is called a Cushite in Genesis, there was a great temptation to identify him with the leader of the Arab dynasty. This idea, however, gained little favour, and has not been held by any section of inquirers as fixing the position of Nimrod. The discovery of the cuneiform inscriptions threw a new light on the subject of Babylonian history, and soon after the decipherment of the inscriptions attention was directed to the question of the identity and age of Nimrod. Sir Henry Rawlinson, the father of Assyrian discovery, first seriously attempted to fix the name of Nimrod in the cuneiform inscriptions, and he endeavoured to find the name in that of the second god of the great Chaldean triad. (See Rawlinson's "Ancient Monarchies," vol. i. p. 117.) The names of this deity are really Enu, Elum, and Bel, and he was evidently worshipped at the dawn of Babylonian history, and is in fact represented as one of the creators of the world; time, moreover, has shown that the cuneiform characters on which the identification was grounded do not bear the phonetic values then supposed.

Sir Henry Rawlinson also suggested ("Ancient Monarchies," p. 136) that the god Nergal was a deification of Nimrod. Nergal, however, which means literally "the illuminator of Hades," was a god of the lower world, and even if Nimrod was deified under the name of Nergal this does not explain his position or epoch.

Canon Rawlinson, brother of Sir Henry, in the first volume of his "Ancient Monarchies," p. 153, and following, makes some judicious remarks on the chronological position of Nimrod, and suggests that he may have reigned a century or two before B.C. 2286; he asserts the historical character of his reign, and supposes him to have founded the Babylonian monarchy, but does not himself identify him with any king known from the inscriptions. At the time when this was written (1871), the conclusions of Canon Rawlinson were the most satisfactory that had been advanced since the discovery of the cuneiform inscriptions. Since this time, however, some new theories have been started, with the idea of identifying Nimrod; one of these, brought forward by Professor Oppert, makes the word a geographical term, but such an explanation is evidently quite insufficient to account for the traditions attached to the name.

Another theory brought forward by the Rev. A. H. Sayce and Josef Grivel, "Transactions of Society of Biblical Archæology," vol. ii. part 2, p. 243, and vol. iii. part 1, p. 136, identifies Nimrod with Merodach, the god of Babylon; partly on the ground of the similarity of name, Merodach being Amar-utuci or Amar-ud in Accadian, partly because Merodach the patron-deity of Babylon stood in the same relation to that city that Asshur did to Assyria (see Micah v. 6), and partly since we find Merodach called "a hero" like Nimrod in Genesis, and assigned "four divine dogs" as though he were a hunter. These dogs are Uccumu "the despoiler," Acculu "the devourer," Icsuda "the capturer," and Iltebu "the carrier away." Merodach, it must be remembered, is always represented as a man, and is armed with weapons of war.

Mr. Smith first fancied that Nimrod might be Khammuragas, whom he identified with the first Arab king of Berosus, as this line of kings appeared to be connected with the Cossæans. This identification failing, after the discovery of the Deluge tablet in 1872, he conjectured that the hero whose name is provisionally read Izdubar is the Nimrod of the Bible, a conjecture which has since been adopted by several other scholars.

The supposition that Nimrod was an ethnic or geographical name, which was at one time favoured by Sir Henry Rawlinson, and has since been urged by Professor Oppert, is quite untenable, for it would be impossible on this theory to account for certain features in what we are told of the hero.

Mr. Smith’s opinion that he was the hero of the Izdubar Epic was first founded on the discovery that the latter formed the centre of the national historical poetry, and was the hero of Babylonian legend—in fact, occupies much the same place as Nimrod in later Arab tradition.

Izdubar, moreover, agrees exactly in character with Nimrod; he was a hunter, according to the cuneiform legends, who contended with and destroyed the lion, tiger, leopard, and wild bull or buffalo, animals the most formidable in the chase in any country. He ruled first in Babylonia over the region which from other sources we know to have been the centre of Nimrod’s kingdom. The principal scene, too, of his exploits and triumphs was the city of Erech, which, according to Genesis, was the second capital of Nimrod.

There remains the fact that the cuneiform name of this hero is undeciphered, the name Izdubar being a mere makeshift. It is possible that when the phonetic reading of the characters is found it will turn out to correspond with the name Nimrod. At all events it is noteworthy that Izdubar seems to have been specially connected with the town of Marad, the original Accadian name of which was Amarda, and that the Accadian an Amarda or “god of Amarda,” closely corresponds with the Biblical name of Nimrod. The translations and notes given in this book will lead, perhaps, to the general admission of the identity of the hero Izdubar with the traditional Nimrod; but this result can be firmly established only when more evidence is before us than that which we have at present.

At the time of the opening of the Epic, the great city of the south of Babylonia, and the capital of this part of the country, was Uruk, called in Genesis, Erech. Erech was devoted to the worship of Anu, the god of heaven, and his wife, the goddess Anatu, as well as of Istar, the Phœnician Ashtoreth, or Astarte, the myth of whose love for the Sun-god Dumuzi or Tammuz, the Adonis of Greek story, is alluded to in the course of the poem. The worship of Anatu, however, was subsequent to the Semitic occupation of the country, since the necessity of providing a female deity by the side of every male one was not felt until the Accadians, whose language was unacquainted with genders, were succeeded by the Semites with their nouns either masculine or feminine.

Here may provisionally be placed the first fragment of the Izdubar legends, K 3200. This fragment consists of part of the third column of a tablet, which is probably the first; and it gives an account of a conquest of Erech by its enemies. The fragment reads:—

1. his ..... he left
2. .... and he goes down to the river,
3. .... in the river his ship is made good.
4. .... he is .... and he weeps bitterly
5. .... placed, the city of Ganganna which had (suffered) destruction.
6. .... their samuri (were) she asses
7. .... their raburi (were) great wild bulls.
8. Like cattle the people fears,
9. like doves the slaves mourn.
10. The gods of Erech the lofty
11. turned to flies and brood in swarms.
12. The spirits (sedu) of Erech the lofty
13. turned to cocks and went forth in outposts.
14. For three years the city of Erech does the enemy besiege,
15. the great gates were thrown down and trampled upon,
16. the goddess Istar before its enemies could not lift her head.
17. Bel his mouth opened and speaks,
18. to Istar the queen a speech he makes:
19. ..... in the midst of Nipur my hands have placed,
20. .... my country? Babylon (Din-tir) the house of my delight,
21. my .... I gave my hands.
22. ..... he was favourable to the sanctuaries
23. ..... in the day ....
24. ..... the great gods. ....

Here we have a graphic account of the condition of Erech, when the enemy overran the country, and the first question which occurs is, who were these conquerors? Conjecture is idle in the want of evidence. They may have been the Semitic successors of the Accadians, they may have been the Medes of Berosus, or they may have been tribes who belong only to the realm of mythology. Mr. Smith believed that they were the subjects of Khumbaba, the tyrant whose death is related in the fourth book of the Epic, and who ruled over the land of Elam.

The name of Khumbaba, or Khubaba, as it is occasionally written, is probably a compound of "Khumba," or "Khumbume," the name of one of the chief Elamite gods. Many other Elamite names compounded with Khumba are mentioned in the inscriptions: Khumba-sidir, an early chief; Khumba-undasa, an Elamite general opposed to Sennacherib; Khumba-nigas, an Elamite monarch opposed to Sargon; Tul-khumba, an Elamite city, &c.

The notice of foreign dominion, and particularly of Elamite supremacy at this time, may, perhaps, form a clue from which to ascertain the approximate age of the poems as we have them. We know that myths are localized in the country of those who hand them down to posterity, and assigned to an age which has made an impression on their narrators. There must have been some reason for the legendary siege and capture of Erech, some actual event around which the story of Izdubar has entwined itself.

Looking at the fragments of Berosus and the notices of Greek and Roman authors, we may ask whether there is any epoch of conquest and foreign dominion which can be fixed upon as representing such an actual event? Let us glance for a moment at the earlier history of Babylonia so far as it is known to us.

The earlier part of the list of dynasties quoted from Berosus gives the following periods from the Flood downwards:—

86 Chaldean kings from the Flood down to the Median conquest, reigning for 34,080 or 33,091 years.

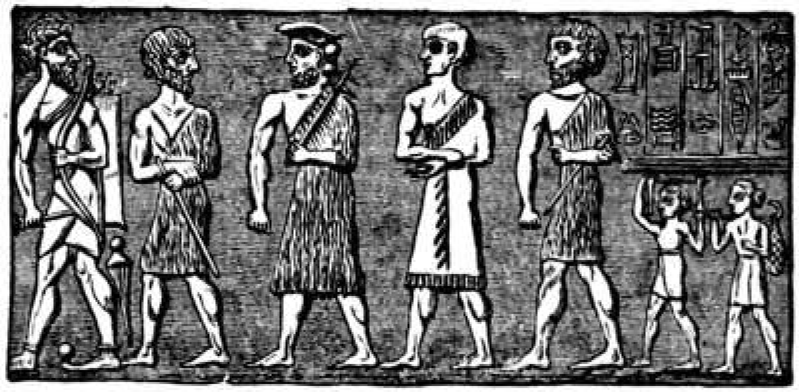
8 Median kings who conquered and held Babylon, 234, or 224, or 190 years.

11 other kings, race and duration unknown.

49 Chaldean kings, for 458 years.

The last of these dynasties preceded a dynasty of kings called Arabian by the copyists of Berosus, and though neither the number of the reigns nor the length of time assigned to the dynasty agrees with what the monuments tell us of the Cassite or Cossæan line of kings, there is no other line which can in any way be identified with the Arabians of the Babylonian historian. The 49 Chaldean kings must, therefore, have reigned before Khammuragas, that is before B.C. 2000-1750. Now an inscription of Nabonidus informs us that Lig-bagas, the first monarch of all Chaldea of whom we know, flourished 700 years anterior to the reign of Khammuragas; he would, therefore, come among the 11 nameless kings of Berosus, supposing any reliance can be placed on the statements of the latter, and about 250 years before the accession of the Chaldean dynasty. But the engraved cylinders and seals of the age of Lig-bagas show that the legend of Izdubar was already popular, and we must accordingly seek a still older period in which to place its origin and attachment to a particular historical event. Hence it may well be that the siege of Erech, the memory of which is preserved in the first book of the Izdubar Epic, was the work of those foreign invaders whom the Babylonian historian has termed Median.

Now it is not improbable that the Median dynasty was really Elamite; or at all events belonged to the same race as the primitive inhabitants of Elam. This race was closely allied to the Accadians; and it was spread over the whole range of country which stretched from the southern shores of the Caspian to the Persian Gulf. The Protomedes, as they are sometimes called, were not conquered and supplanted by Aryan invaders from the east till the ninth century B.C. It was in their country that Kharsak-kurra, "the Mountain of the East," was localized whereon the Accadians and their kinsfolk in Elam and Media believed the ark to have rested after the Flood, and which they regarded as the cradle of their race. It was therefore pre-eminently "the land," mada in Accadian, and from this mada there is every reason to think the name of Media has been derived. Consequently, the Medians of Berosus, the inhabitants of mada "the land" of the east, need not have been more than one of the many Elamite swarms that from time to time descended into the fertile plains of Babylonia, and not unfrequently obtained a settlement there. Such were the Accadians, or “Highlanders” themselves; such, too, the two Cassite or Cossæan dynasties which we learn from the monuments long held sway over Chaldea.



MIGRATION OF EASTERN TRIBE; FROM EARLY BABYLONIAN CYLINDER.

An early Babylonian cylinder, which came from Erech and originally belonged to a member of the royal family of that city, presents us with a curious picture of a rude nomad tribe apparently arriving in Babylonia. The chief marches in front armed with bow and arrows, and wearing the same kind of boots with turned-up ends as distinguished the Hittites in ancient times and are still worn in Asia Minor and Greece. They indicate that the wearer came from a cold and mountainous country. The animals’ skins which compose the dresses of his three retainers also point to a similar conclusion. Besides the retainers, the wife of the chief is depicted, as well as two slaves who carry some objects on their shoulders. Unfortunately no light is cast upon the group by the inscription, which simply states that the cylinder belonged to “Gibil-dur (or Ne-Zicum), the brother of the king of Erech, the librarian, thy servant.” All we can gather from it is that the famous library of Erech, which furnished Assur-bani-pal and his scribes with the original texts of the Izdubar Epic, was already in existence, and that the office of librarian was considered honourable enough to be borne by a brother of the reigning monarch.

If the legendary siege of Erech is not to be referred to the epoch of the Median conquest, it may have fallen at the time when the image of the goddess Nana was carried away from Erech by the Elamite king Kudur-nankhundi, 1635 years before the capture of Shushan, the capital of Elam, by the Assyrians (about B.C. 645), and consequently about B.C. 2280. A fragment which refers to this period in “Cuneiform Inscriptions,” vol. iii. p. 38, relates the destruction wrought in the country by the Elamites, and makes Kudur-nankhundi follow one of the other monarchs of an Elamite dynasty and exceed his predecessors in the injury he did to the country.

Putting together the detached notices of this period, the following may approximately represent the chronology, the dates being understood as round numbers.

? B.C. 2750, Elamites (Medes) overrun Babylonia.

B.C. 2280, Kudur-nankhundi, king of Elam, ravages Erech.

B.C. 1800, Khammuragas conquers Babylonia.

Although the dates transmitted through ancient authors are as a rule vague and doubtful, there are many independent notices which seem to point to somewhere about the twenty-third century before the Christian era for the foundation of the Babylonian and Assyrian power. Several of these dates are connected either directly or by implication with Nimrod, who first formed a united empire over these regions.

The following are some of these notices:—

Simplicius relates that Callisthenes, the friend of Alexander, sent to Aristotle from Babylon a series of stellar observations reaching back 1,903 years before the taking of Babylon by Alexander. This would make 1903 + 331 = B.C. 2234.

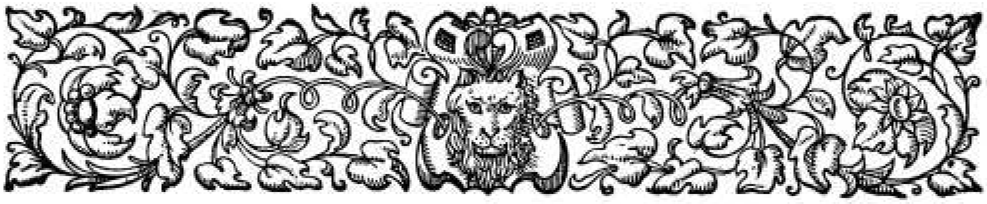
Berosus and Critodemus are said by Pliny to have made the inscribed stellar observations reach to 480 years before the era of Phoroneus; as the latter date was supposed to be about the middle of the eighteenth century B.C., 480 years before it comes also to about the period of Kudur-nankhundi.

Diodorus makes the Assyrian empire commence a thousand years or more before the Trojan war.

Ctesias and Cephalion make its foundation early in the twenty-second century B.C.

The two last statements, however, are probably derived from Ctesias, whose so-called history has been shown by cuneiform decipherment to have been a mere fiction put together out of misunderstood myths and fragments of theology. In any case, too, they apply only to the foundation of the Assyrian power, which was modern as compared with that of Babylonia, in spite of the assertion of Sargon, who boasts of having been preceded on the throne by 350 kings.

Of the latter part of the first tablet of the Izdubar Epic we have as yet no knowledge.



CHAPTER XII.
MEETING OF HEA-BANI AND IZDUBAR.

Dream of Izdubar.—Hea-bani.—His wisdom.—His solitary life.—Izdubar's petition.—Zaidu.—Kharimtu and Samkhat.—Tempt Hea-bani.—Might and fame of Izdubar.—Speech of Hea-bani.—His journey to Erech.—The midannu or tiger.—Festival at Erech.—Dream of Izdubar.—Friendship with Hea-bani.

IN this chapter are included the fragments of what appear to be the second and third tablets or books. In this section of the story Izdubar comes prominently forward, and meets with Hea-bani. The notice of his mother Dannat appears in one of the tablets given in this chapter.

Izdubar, in the Babylonian and Assyrian sculptures, is always represented with a marked physiognomy, and his peculiarities can be seen by noticing the photograph from a Babylonian gem at the beginning of the book, the engraving from an Assyrian sculpture in the last chapter, and the engraving in page 249 showing Izdubar and Hea-bani struggling with wild animals. In all these cases, and in every other instance where Izdubar is represented, he is indicated as a man with masses of curls over his head and a large curly beard. The type is so marked and so distinct from either the Assyrian or the Babylonian one that it is hard to say to what race it should be attached.

The deity of Izdubar was Lugal-turda, the god who was changed into the bird of storm according to the old myth, from which it may be supposed that he was a native of the district of Amarda or Marad, where that god was worshipped. This district Mr. Smith thought was probably the Amordacia or Mardocæa of Ptolemy, but its situation is uncertain.

The fragments of the second and third tablets assume by their notices that Izdubar was already known as a mighty hunter, and it appears a little later that he claimed descent from the old Babylonian heroes, as he calls Xisuthrus, the Chaldean Noah, his "father."

TABLET II.

A single fragment which Mr. Smith believed to belong to this tablet has been found; it is K 3389, and contains part of the third and fourth columns of writing. It appears from this that Izdubar was then at Erech, and had a curious dream. He thought he saw the stars of heaven fall to the ground, and in their descent they struck upon his back. He then saw standing over him a terrible being, the aspect of whose face was fierce, and who was armed with claws, like the claws of lions. The greater part of the description of the dream is lost; it probably occupied Columns I. and II. of the second tablet. Thinking that the dream portended some fate to himself, Izdubar calls on all the wise men to explain it, and offers a reward to any one who can interpret the dream. Here the fragment K 3389 comes in:

Column III.

1. .... ru kili I ....
2. .... he and the princes may he ...
3. .... in the vicinity send him,
4. .... may they ennoble his family,
5. .... at the head of his feast may he set thee
6. .... may he array thee in jewels and gold
7. .... may he enclose thee
8. .... in his .... seat thee
9. into the houses of the gods may he cause thee to enter
10. .... seven wives
11. .... cause illness in his stomach
12. .... went up alone
13. .... his heaviness to his friend
14. .... a dream I dreamed in my sleep
15. .... the stars of heaven fell to the earth
16. .... I stood still
17. .... his face
18. .... his face was terrible
19. .... like the claws of a lion, were his claws.
20. .... the strength in me
21. .... he slew
22. .... me
23. .... over me
24. .... corpse ....

The first part of this fragment appears to recount the honours offered by Izdubar to any one who should interpret the dream. These included the ennobling of his family, his recognition in assemblies, his being invested with jewels of honour, and his wives being increased. A description of the dream of the hero, much mutilated, follows. The conduct of Nebuchadnezzar in the Book of Daniel, with reference to his dreams, bears some resemblance to that of Izdubar.

After this fragment we have again a blank in the story, and it would appear that in this interval application was made to a nondescript creature named Hea-bani that he would go to the city of Erech and interpret the dream of Izdubar.

Hea-bani appears, from the representations on seals and other objects on which he is figured, to have been a satyr or faun. He is always drawn with the feet and tail of an ox, and with horns on his head. He is said to have lived in a cave among the wild animals of the forest, and was supposed to possess wonderful knowledge both of nature and human affairs. In appearance he resembles the se'irim or hairy demons, half men, half goats, who inhabited the deserts and were a terror to passers-by. Reference is made to them in Lev. xvii. 7, 2 Chron. xi. 15, Is. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 14, from which we learn that worship was paid to them, and that they were supposed to be specially connected with the neighbourhood of Babylon. Hea-bani was angry at the request that he should abandon his solitary life for the friendship of Izdubar, and where our narrative reopens the god Samas is persuading him to accept the offer. It may be added that the name Hea-bani signifies "Hea created me," from which we may infer that the monster was believed to have originally ascended like Oannes out of the abysses of the sea.

COLUMN IV.

1. ... me

7. they shall give thee the insignia of royalty
8. they shall make thee become great
9. and Izdubar thou shalt call and incline him towards thee
10. and Izdubar shall make friendship unto thee
11. he shall cause thee to recline on a grand couch
12. on a beautiful couch he shall seat thee
13. he will cause thee to sit on a comfortable seat a seat on the left
14. the kings of the earth shall kiss thy feet
15. he shall enrich thee and the men of Erech he shall make silent before thee
16. and he after thee shall take all ....
17. he shall clothe thy body in raiment and ....

18. Hea-bani heard the words of Samas the warrior
19. and the anger of his heart was appeased
20. .... was appeased

Here we are still dealing with the honours which Izdubar promises to the interpreter of his dream, and these seem to show that Izdubar had some power at Erech at this time; he does not, however, appear to have been an independent king, and it is probable that the next two columns of this tablet, now lost, contain negotiations for bringing Hea-bani to Erech, the subject being continued on the third tablet.

TABLET III.

This tablet is far better preserved than the two previous ones; it gives the account of the successful mission to bring Hea-bani to Erech, opening with a broken account of the wisdom of Hea-bani.

COLUMN I.

35. I desire thy company to the midst of Erech the lofty,
36. to the temple of Elli-tardusi the seat of Anu and Istar,
37. the dwelling of Izdubar the mighty giant,
38. who also like a bull towers over the chiefs.
39. She spake to him and before her speech,
40. the wisdom of his heart flew away and disappeared.
41. Hea-bani to her also said to Kharimtu:
42. I join to Samkhat my companionship,
43. to the temple of Elli-tardusi the seat of Anu and Istar,
44. the dwelling of Izdubar the mighty giant,
45. who also like a bull towers over the chiefs.
46. I will meet him and see his power,

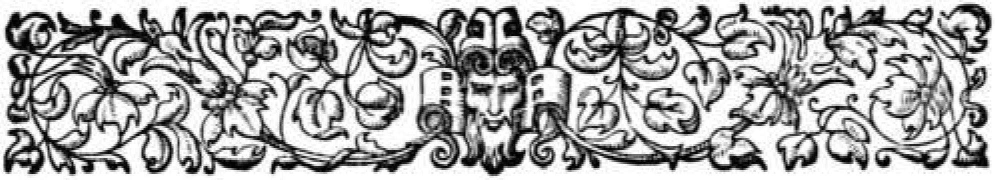
There is one other mutilated fragment of this and the next column with part of a relation respecting beasts and a fragment of a conversation between Izdubar and his mother.

The whole of this tablet is curious, and it certainly gives the successful issue of the attempt to bring Hea-bani to Erech, and in very fragmentary condition the dream of the monarch.

It appears that the females Samkhat and Kharimtu prevailed upon Hea-bani to come to Erech and see the exploits of the giant Izdubar, and he declared that he would bring a Midannu, most probably a tiger, to Erech, in order to make trial of the strength of Izdubar, and to see if he could destroy it.

The Midannu is mentioned in the Assyrian texts as a fierce carnivorous animal allied to the lion and leopard; it is called Midannu, Mindinu, and Mandinu. In a list of animals it is associated with the dumamu or cat.

In the fifth column, after the description of the festivities which followed the arrival of Hea-bani, there appears a break between lines 15 and 16, some part of the original story being probably omitted here. The Assyrian copy probably is here defective, at least one line being lost. The portion here omitted seems to have stated that the following speech was made by the mother of Izdubar, who figures prominently in the earlier part of these legends.



CHAPTER XIII.
DESTRUCTION OF THE TYRANT KHUMBABA.

Mythical geography.—Forest region.—Khumbaba.—Conversation.—Petition to Samas.—Journey to forest.—Dwelling of Khumbaba.—Entrance to forest.—Meeting with Khumbaba.—Death of Khumbaba.—Izdubar king.

THE wretchedly mutilated condition of the fragments that belong to the two next tablets or books of the Epic makes it impossible to ascertain their correct order and arrangement. The arrangement given here, accordingly, must be regarded as merely provisional. It may, however, be taken as certain that they all form part of the fourth and fifth tablets, and relate the contest between Izdubar and Khumbaba.

Khumbaba, the Kombabos of the Greeks, was the prototype of Geryon. He dwelt far away in the forest of pines and sherbin cedars, where the gods and spirits had their abode. It was, consequently, in the cold region of the Accadian Olympus, now Mount Elwend, that he was placed by the old mythology, and the similarity of his name to that of the Elamite god Khumba or Khumbume makes it possible that he was originally identical with the latter. In this case the antagonism between Khumbaba and Izdubar would have been merely a reflection of the antagonism that existed between the inhabitants of Babylonia and the subjects of the Elamite empire. Mr. Smith even thought that the overthrow of Khumbaba might have been an echo of the overthrow of some Elamite dynasty by a Chaldean one.

In the case of the fourth tablet Mr. Smith believed that he had found fragments of all six columns, but some of these fragments are useless until we have further fragments to complete them.

4. .... the ornaments of her breast
5. .... and her crown I divided
6. .... of the earth he opened
7. he .... he ascended to the city
8. he went up to the presence of Samas he made a sacrifice?
9. he built an altar. In the presence of Samas he lifted his hands:

12. on the remote path to Khumbaba.

13. A battle he knows not he will confront,
14. an expedition he knows not he will ride to,
15. for long he will go and will return,
16. to take the course to the forest of pine trees,
17. to Khumbaba of [whom his city may] he destroy,
18. and every one who is evil whom thou hatest ...
19. In the day of the year he will ....
20. May she not return at all, may she not ...
21. him to fix ....

(About ten lines lost here.)

Here we see that Izdubar, impressed with the magnitude of the task he had undertaken, makes a prayer and sacrifice to Samas to aid him in his task. The next fragment appears also to belong to this column, and may refer to preliminaries for sacrificing to Istar, with a view also to gain her aid in the enterprise.

This fragment of Column II. reads

1. .... neighbourhood of Erech ....
2. .... strong and ...
3. he burst open the road ....
4. and that city ....
5. and the collection ....
6. placed the people together ....
7. the people were ended ....

10. to the goddess Istar the bed ....
11. to Izdubar like the god Sakim ....
12. Hea-bani opened the great gate of the house of assembly ....
13. for Izdubar to enter ....
14. .... in the gate of the house ....

COLUMN III.

1. the corpse of ....

2. to ....
3. to the rising of ....
4. the angels ....
5. may she not return ....
6. him to fix ....
7. the expedition which he knows not ....
8. may he destroy also ....
9. of which he knows ....
10. the road ....

Five more mutilated lines, the rest of the column being lost.

This fragment shows Izdubar still invoking the gods for his coming expedition. Under the next column Mr. Smith placed a fragment, the position and meaning of which are quite unknown.

COLUMN IV.—UNCERTAIN FRAGMENT.

1. he was heavy ....
2. Hea-bani was ....
3. Hea-bani strong not rising ....
4. When ....
5. with thy song? ....
6. the sister of the gods faithful ....
7. wandering he fixed to ....
8. the sister of the gods lifted ....
9. and the daughters of the gods grew ....
10. I Hea-bani .... he lifted to ....

Somewhere here should be the story, now lost, of the starting of Izdubar on his expedition accompanied by his friend Hea-bani. The sequel shows they arrive at the palace or residence of Hea-bani, which is surrounded by a forest of pine and cedar, the whole being enclosed by some barrier or wall, with a gate for entrance. Hea-bani and Izdubar open this gate where the story reopens on the fifth column.

COLUMN V.

1. the sharp weapon

2. to make men fear him ....
3. Khumbaba poured a tempest out of his mouth ....
4. he heard the gate of the forest [open]
5. the sharp weapon to make men fear him [he took]
6. and in the path of his forest he stood and [waited]

7. Izdubar to him also [said to Hea-bani]

Here we see Khumbaba waiting for the intruders, but the rest of the column is lost; it appears to have principally consisted of speeches by Izdubar and Hea-bani on the magnificent trees they saw, and the work before them. A single fragment of Column VI., containing fragments of six lines, shows them still at the gate, and when the next tablet, No. V., opens, they had not yet entered.

TABLET V.

The fifth tablet is more certain than the last; it appears to refer to the conquest of Khumbaba. Only fragments of this tablet, which opens with a description of the retreat of Khumbaba, have as yet been discovered.

COLUMN I.

1. He stood and surveyed the forest
2. of pine trees, he perceived its height,
3. of the forest he perceived its approach,
4. in the place where Khumbaba went his step was placed,
5. on a straight road and a good path.
6. He saw the land of the pine trees, the seat of the gods, the sanctuary of the angels,
7. in front? of the seed the pine tree carried its fruit,
8. good was its shadow, full of pleasure,
9. an excellent tree, the choice of the forest,

(Many other broken lines.)

There are a few fragments of Columns III., IV., and V., and a small portion of Column VI., which reads:

1. .... cedar to ....
2. .... he placed and ....
3. .... 120 .... Hea-bani ....
4. .... the head of Khumbaba ....

5. .... his weapon he sharpened ....
6. .... tablet of the story of fate of ....

It appears from the various mutilated fragments of this tablet that Izdubar and Hea-bani conquer and slay Khumbaba and take his goods, but much is wanted to connect the fragments.

The conclusion of this stage of the story and triumph of Izdubar are given at the commencement of the sixth tablet. The conquest of Khumbaba gave Izdubar the crown and attributes of his fallen rival, who seems to have been a sun-god, and this caused Istar, who already appears as the bride of the sun in the myth of Tammuz, to woo the triumphant hero.

CHAPTER XIV.
THE ADVENTURES OF ISTAR.

Triumph of Izdubar.—Istar's love.—Her offer of marriage.—Her promises.—Izdubar's answer.—Tammuz.—Amours of Istar.—His refusal.—Istar's anger.—Ascends to Heaven.—The bull.—Slain by Izdubar.—Istar's curse.—Izdubar's triumph.—The feast.—Istar's despair.—Her descent to Hades.—Description.—The seven gates.—The curses.—Atsu-sunamir the Sphinx.—Release of Istar.—The dog of the dawn.—Lament for Tammuz.

IN this chapter are included the sixth and seventh tablets, which both primarily refer to the doings of Istar.

TABLET VI.

The sixth tablet is in better condition than any of the former ones, and allows of something like a connected translation.

COLUMN I.

1. .... his weapon, he made bright his weapon.
2. Like a bull his mountain he ascended after him.
3. He destroyed him and clothed himself with his spoils.
4. The ... he put on and the fastening of the crown he tore.
5. Izdubar his crown put on (and the fastening of the crown he tore).
6. For the favour of Izdubar the princess Istar lifted the eyes:
7. I will make thee also Izdubar my husband,[18]
8. thy oath to me shall be thy bond,
9. thou shalt be husband and I will be thy wife.
10. I will make (thy) chariot glisten with crystal and gold,
11. of which the body is gold and its horns are strong.
12. I will cause thy days to find gifts, O judge (?) of the great.
13. Into our house enter, mid the scent of the pines.
14. When thou enterest our house
15. may the river Euphrates kiss thy feet.

16. There shall be under thee kings, lords, and princes.
17. The tribute of the mountains and plains may they bring to thee as an offering.
18. May thy herds and flocks bring forth twins,
19. may the increase of the cows come unto (thee),
20. may thy (horse) be strong, without ceasing, in the chariot,
21. may (thy steed) in the yoke never have a rival.

22. (Izdubar) opened his mouth and speaks;
23. (he says) to the princess Istar:
24. .... to thee thy possession
25. .... body and rottenness (?)
26. .... baldness and famine
27. .... I keep back the instruments of divinity

COLUMN II.

1. Rest thee and .....
2. as for Tammuz the lover of (thy) youth
3. year after year thou hast wearied him with thy love.

4. Allala the eagle also thou lovest and
5. thou didst strike him, and his wings thou didst break;
6. he stood in the forest, he begged for wings.
7. Thou lovest also a lion lusty in might,
8. thou didst tear out by sevens his claws.
9. Thou lovest also a horse glorious in war,
10. he yielded himself and thou didst weary his love overmuch.
11. For seven kaspu (fourteen hours) thou didst weary his love without ceasing,
12. troubled and thirsting thou didst weary him.
13. To his mother Silele thou didst send him wearied with thy love.
14. Thou lovest also the shepherd Tabulu,
15. of whom continually thou didst ask for thy stibium.
16. Every day he propitiated thee with offerings,
17. thou didst strike him and to a hyena thou didst change him;
18. his own village drove him away;
19. his dogs tore his wounds.
20. Thou lovest also Isullanu the husbandman of thy father,
21. who continually was subject to thy order;
22. each day had he made bright thy dish.
23. The eyes thou didst take from him and didst put him in chains,
24. (saying): O Isullanu, cut thy hand, eat (thy) eyes!
25. And thy hand thou didst bring out and thou didst strike? ....
26. Isullanu says to thee:
27. As for me what dost thou ask of me?
28. My mother, thou art not beautiful, and I eat not.
29. The food I have eaten is plentiful, even pain and waking;
30. trembling and faintness overcome me (?)
31. Thou didst hear also this ....
32. thou didst strike him; to a pillar[19] thou didst change him,
33. thou didst place him also in the midst of the land ....
34. that he rise not up, that he go not ....
35. And as for me dost thou love me, and like to him wilt thou [serve me]?

36. When Istar (heard) this,
37. Istar was angry and to heaven she ascended;

38. Istar went also to the presence of Anu her father,
39. to the presence of Anatu her mother she went and says:
40. My father, Izdubar hates me, and

Column III.

1. Izdubar despises my beauty,
2. my beauty and my charms.

8. And Istar ascended over the fortress of Erech the lofty,
9. she destroyed the bull, she uttered a curse:
10. Woe to Izdubar who has overthrown me, has slain the bull of Anu.
11. Hea-bani also heard this speech of Istar,
12. and he cut off the member of the bull of Anu and before her he laid it;
13. And what of it? since I conquered thee when him also (i.e. Izdubar)
14. I caused thee to listen to;
15. its skin also I have hung up at thy side.
16. Istar gathered her maidens
17. Samkhati and Kharimati,[21]
18. over the member of the bull of Anu a mourning she made.
19. Izdubar called on the people, the multitude
20. all of them:
21. with the thickness of his horns the young men were glorious,
22. 30 manehs of crystal (was) their substance,
23. the sharpness of the points was destroyed,
24. 6 gurs its mass altogether.
25. For the food of his god Lugal-turda he cut it up;
26. he seethed it and hangs it up in the rising of his fire;
27. in the river Euphrates they washed their hands.
28. They had been taken and gone
29. through the street of Erech riding,
30. the assembly of the warriors of Erech put trust in them.
31. Izdubar to the inhabitants of Erech
32. .... a proclamation made.

COLUMN VI.

1. “If anyone is of ability among the chiefs,
2. if any is noble among the men,
3. Izdubar is able among the chiefs,
4. Izdubar is noble among the men,
5. .... our strength

8. Izdubar in his palace made a rejoicing,
9. the chiefs reclining lie on couches at night.
10. Hea-bani lies down, a dream he dreams.
11. Hea-bani came and the dream he explains,
12. and says to Izdubar.

Tablet VII.

The seventh tablet opens with the words, “My friend, what is this counsel the great gods are taking?” It is uncertain if any other portion of this tablet has been found, but part of a remarkable fragment, with a continuation of the story of Istar, has been placed here. It appears that the goddess, failing in her attempt in heaven to avenge herself on Izdubar for his slight, resolved to descend to hell, to search out, if possible, new modes of attacking him.

Columns I. and II. are lost, the fragments recommencing on Column III.

Column III.

1. .... people? to destroy his hand approached
2. .... raise in thy presence
3. .... like before
4. .... Zaidu (shall accomplish) the wish of his heart
5. with the female Samkhat .... he brought
6. .... thee, the female Samkhat will expel thee
7. (homage) they did not perform ......
8. assemble thou a great assembly;
9. .... the strong one has caused thee to be struck, even thee.
10. ... goods of the house of thy fulness

After many lines destroyed, the story recommences in the fourth column.

COLUMN IV.

1. [To Hades the country whence none return] I turn myself,
2. I spread like a bird my hands.
3. I descend, I descend to the house of darkness, the dwelling of the god Irkalla:
4. to the house out of which there is no exit,
5. to the road from which there is no return:
6. to the house from whose entrance the light is taken,
7. the place where dust is their nourishment and their food mud.
8. Its chiefs also are like birds covered with feathers;
9. the light is never seen, in darkness they dwell.
10. In the house, O my friend, which I will enter,
11. for me is treasured up a crown;
12. with those wearing crowns who from days of old ruled the earth,
13. to whom the gods Anu and Bel have given names of rule.
14. Water (?) they have given to quench the thirst they drink limpid waters.
15. In the house, O my friend, which I will enter,
16. dwell the lord and the unconquered one,
17. dwell the priest and the great man,
18. dwell the worms of the deep of the great gods;
19. there dwells Etana, there dwells the god Ner,
20. (there dwells) the queen of the lower regions, Allat,
21. the mistress of the fields the mother of the queen of the lower regions before her submits,
22. and there is not any one that stands against her in her presence.
23. I will approach her and she will see me
24. ... and she will bring me to her

Here the story is again lost, Columns V. and VI. being absent. It would seem that Hea-bani is here telling his friend how he must die and descend into the house of Hades. Mr. Smith, however, thought that in the third column some one is speaking to Istar, trying to persuade her not to descend to Hades, while in the fourth column the goddess, who is suffering all the pangs of jealousy and hate, revels in the dark details of the description of the lower regions, and declares her determination to go there.

If this view is correct, this part of the legend would be connected with the beautiful story of the Descent of Istar into Hades which describes how the goddess descended into the lower world in search of her husband Tammuz, the Sun-god, who had been slain by the boar’s tusk of winter. Tammuz became Adonis, the Phœnician adonai “lord,” among the Greeks, to whom the story of Aphroditê and Adonis had been carried by the Phœnicians. The story is one which meets us in the mythologies of many races and nations throughout the world, and has grown in each case out of the winter-sleep of the sun and his resurrection in the spring. Its last echo in our own European folklore may be heard in the tale of the Sleeping Beauty. A calendar found among the banking records of the Egibi firm in Babylonia notes on the 15th day of the month Tammuz or June “an eclipse of the Moon,” apparently in reference to the descent of the Moon-goddess Istar into Hades. The legend survives in a changed form in the Talmud (Yoma 69b, Sanhedrim 60a). Here it is said that after the Captivity the elders of the nation, headed by Ezra and Nehemiah, besought God that the demon of lust might be delivered into their hands. In spite of a prophetic voice which warned them of the consequences of their request, it was persisted in, and the demon was given up to them and imprisoned. But before three days were over, the whole course of the world was thrown into disorder. No eggs even were to be had, and the Jewish elders were obliged to confess their mistake and release the demon from his fetters.

The descent of Istar into Hades from K 162.

1. To Hades the land whence none return, the land (of darkness),
2. Istar daughter of Sin (the moon) her ear (inclined);
3. inclined also the daughter of Sin her ear,
4. to the house of darkness the dwelling of the god Irkalla,
5. to the house out of which there is no exit,
6. to the road from which there is no return,
7. to the house from whose entrance the light is taken,
8. the place where dust is their nourishment and their food mud.
9. Light is never seen, in darkness they dwell.
10. Its chiefs also are like birds covered with feathers,
11. over the door and bolts is scattered dust.
12. Istar on her arrival at the gate of Hades,
13. to the keeper of the gate a command she addresses:

14. Keeper of the waters, open thy gate,
15. open thy gate that I may enter.
16. If thou openest not the gate that I may enter,
17. I will strike the door, the bolts I will shatter,
18. I will strike the threshold and will pass through the doors;
19. I will raise up the dead to devour the living,
20. above the living the dead shall exceed in numbers.
21. The keeper opened his mouth and speaks,
22. he says to the princess Istar:
23. Stay, lady, thou dost not glorify her,
24. let me go and thy name repeat to the queen Allat.
25. The keeper descended and says to Allat:
26. This water (of life) thy sister Istar (comes to seek).
27. The queen of the great vaults (of heaven) ....
28. Allat on hearing this says:
29. Like the cutting off of the herb has (Istar) descended (into Hades),
30. like the lip of a deadly insect (?) she has ...
31. What will her heart bring me (i.e. matter to me), what will her anger (bring me)?
32: (Istar replies:) This water with (my husband)
33. like food would I eat, like beer would I drink.
34. Let me weep over the strong who have left their wives.
35. Let me weep over the handmaids who (have lost) the embraces of their husbands.
36. Over the only son let me mourn, who ere his days are come is taken away.
37. (Allat says:) Go keeper open thy gate to her,
38. bewitch her also according to the ancient rules.
39. The keeper went and opened his gate:
40. Enter, O lady, let the city of Cutha[22] receive thee;
41. let the palace of Hades rejoice at thy presence.
42. The first gate he caused her to enter and touched her, he threw down the great crown of her head.
43. Why, O keeper, hast thou thrown down the great crown of my head?
44. Enter, O lady, of Allat thus is the order.

45. The second gate he caused her to enter and touched her, he threw away the earrings of her ears.
46. Why, keeper, hast thou thrown away the earrings of my ears?
47. Enter, O lady, of Allat thus is the order.
48. The third gate he caused her to enter and touched her, he threw away the necklace[23] of her neck.
49. Why, keeper, hast thou thrown away the necklace of my neck?
50. Enter, O lady, of Allat thus is the order.
51. The fourth gate he caused her to enter and touched her, he threw away the ornaments of her breast.
52. Why, keeper, hast thou thrown away the ornaments of my breast?
53. Enter, O lady, of Allat thus is the order.
54. The fifth gate he caused her to enter and touched her, he threw away the gemmed girdle of her waist.
55. Why, keeper, hast thou thrown away the gemmed girdle of my waist?
56. Enter, O lady, of Allat thus is the order.
57. The sixth gate he caused her to enter and touched her, he threw away the bracelets of her hands and her feet.
58. Why, keeper, hast thou thrown away the bracelets of my hands and my feet?
59. Enter, O lady, of Allat thus is the order.
60. The seventh gate he caused her to enter and touched her, he threw away the covering robe of her body.
61. Why, keeper, hast thou thrown away the covering robe of my body?
62. Enter, O lady, of Allat thus is the order.
63. When for a long time Istar into Hades had descended,
64. Allat saw her and at her presence was arrogant;
65. Istar did not take counsel, at her she swore.
66. Allat her mouth opened and speaks,
67. to Namtar (the plague-demon) her messenger a command she addresses:
68. Go Namtar [take Istar from] me and
69. take her out to .... even Istar
70. diseased eyes (strike) her with,
71. diseased side (strike) her with,

72. diseased feet (strike) her with,
73. diseased heart (strike) her with,
74. diseased head (strike) her with,
75. strike her, the whole of her [strike with disease].
76. After Istar the lady [into Hades had descended],
77. with the cow the bull would not unite, and the ass the female ass would not approach;
78. the female slave in the streets would not let herself be touched.
79. The freeman ceased to give his command,
80. the female slave ceased to give her gift.

COLUMN II.

1. Papsukul, the messenger of the great gods bowed his face before (Samas);
2. ....
3. Samas (the sun-god) went and in the presence of his father the moon-god he stood,
4. into the presence of Hea the king he went in tears:
5. Istar into the lower regions has descended, she has not ascended back;
6. for a long time Istar into Hades has descended,
7. with the cow the bull will not unite, the ass the female ass will not approach;
8. the female slave in the street will not let herself be touched;
9. the freeman has ceased to give his command,
10. the female slave has ceased to give her gift.
11. Hea in the wisdom of his heart formed a resolution,
12. and made Atsu-sunamir[24] the sphinx:[25]
13. Go Atsu-sunamir towards the gates of Hades set thy face;
14. may the seven gates of Hades be opened at thy presence;
15. may Allat see thee and rejoice at thy presence;
16. when she shall be at rest in her heart, and her liver be appeased.
17. Conjure her by the name of the great gods.
18. Raise thy heads, to the roaring stream set thy ear;
19. may the lady (Istar) overmaster the roaring stream, the waters in the midst of it may she drink.

20. Allat on hearing this,
21. beat her breast, she bit her thumb,
22. she turned again, a request she asked not:
23. Go, Atsu-sunamir, may I imprison thee in the great prison,
24. may the garbage of the foundations of the city be thy food,
25. may the drains of the city be thy drink,
26. may the darkness of the dungeon be thy dwelling,
27. may a stake be thy seat,
28. may hunger and thirst strike thy offspring.
29. Allat her mouth opened and speaks,
30. to Namtar her messenger a command she addresses:
31. Go, Namtar, strike the firmly-fixed palace,
32. the ashêrim[26] adorn with stones of the dawn,
33. bid the spirits of earth come forth, on a throne of gold seat (them),
34. unto Istar give the waters of life and bring her before me.
35. Namtar went, he struck the firmly-fixed palace,
36. the ashêrim he adorned with stones of the dawn,
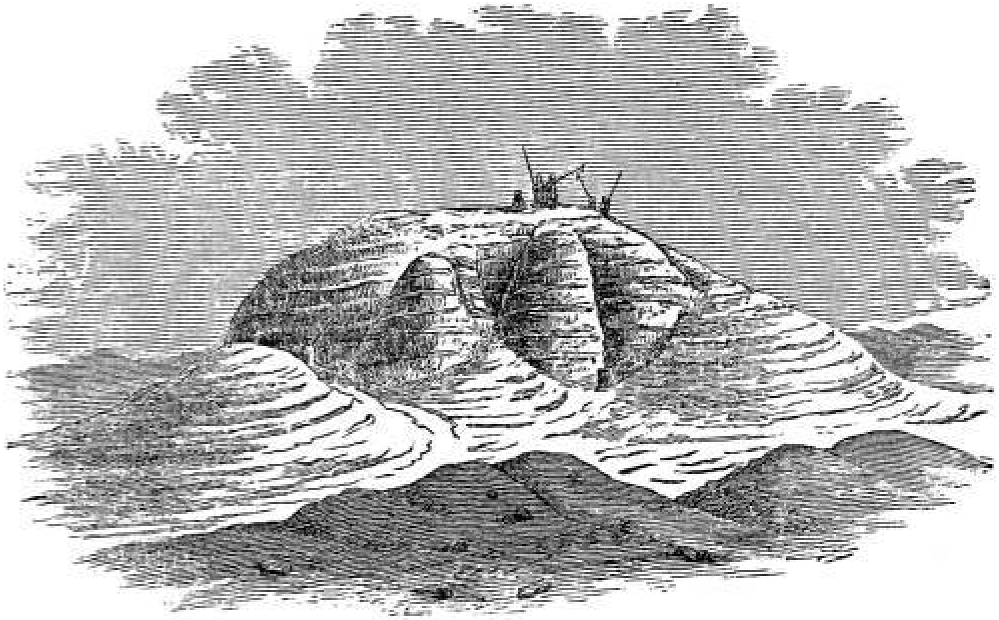
37. he brought forth the spirits of earth, on a throne of gold he seated (them).
38. To Istar he gave the waters of life and took her.
39. The first gate he passed her out of, and he restored to her the covering robe of her body.
40. The second gate he passed her out of, and he restored to her the bracelets of her hands and her feet.
41. The third gate he passed her out of, and he restored to her the gemmed girdle of her waist.
42. The fourth gate he passed her out of, and he restored to her the ornaments of her breast.
43. The fifth gate he passed her out of, and he restored to her the necklace of her neck.
44. The sixth gate he passed her out of, and he restored to her the earrings of her ears.
45. The seventh gate he passed her out of, and he restored to her the great crown of her head.
46. Since thou hast not paid, (he says) a ransom for thy deliverance to her (i.e. Allat), so to her again turn back
47. for Tammuz the husband of (thy) youth;

48. the glistening waters pour over (him), the drops (sprinkle upon him);
49. in splendid clothing dress him, with a ring of crystal adorn (him).
50. May Samkhat appease the grief (of Istar),
51. and, Kharimat,[27] give to her comfort.
52. The precious eye-stones also she destroyed not,
53. the wound of her brother (Tammuz) she heard, she smote (her breast), she, even Kharimat, gave her comfort;
54. the precious eye-stones, her amulets, she commanded not,
55. (saying): O my only brother, thou dost not lament for me.
56. In the day that Tammuz adorned me, with a ring of crystal, with a bracelet of emeralds, together with himself he adorned me,
57. with himself he adorned me; may men mourners and women mourners
58. on a bier place (him), and assemble the wake.

This remarkable text shows Istar fulfilling her threat and descending to Hades, but it does not appear that she had as yet accomplished her vengeance against Izdubar.

At the opening of the sixth tablet we have the final scene of the contest with Khumbaba. Izdubar, after slaying Khumbaba, takes the crown from the head of the monarch and places it on his own head, thus signifying that he assumed the empire. There were, as we are informed in several places, kings, lords, and princes, merely local rulers, but these generally submitted to the greatest power; and just as they had bowed to Khumbaba, so they were ready now to submit to Izdubar. The kingdom promised to Izdubar when he started to encounter Khumbaba now became his by right of superior force, and he entered the halls of the palace of Erech and feasted with his heroes.

We are thus brought to a curious part of the story, the romance of Izdubar and Istar. One of the strange and dark features of the Babylonian religion was the Istar or Venus worship, which was an adoration of the reproductive power of nature, accompanied by ceremonies which were a reproach to the country. The city of Erech, originally a seat of the worship of Anu, was now one of the foremost cities in this Istar worship. Tammuz, the young and beautiful Sun-god, the dead bridegroom of Istar, seems to be also spoken of as the brother of her handmaid Kharimat. This explains, as M. Lenormant has pointed out, the passage in Jeremiah xxii. 18, which preserves a portion of the wailing cry uttered by the worshippers of Tammuz or Adonis when celebrating his untimely death. This should be rendered: “Ah me, my brother, and ah me, my sister! Ah me, Adonis, and ah me, his lady!” Reference is made to the worship of Tammuz, which was carried on within the Temple itself at Jerusalem, in Ezek. viii. 14, Amos viii. 10, (where we should translate “as at the mourning for the only son” Tammuz), and Zech. xii. 10, 11. Tammuz is the Semitic form of the Accadian Dumuzi which signified in that language “the only son.”

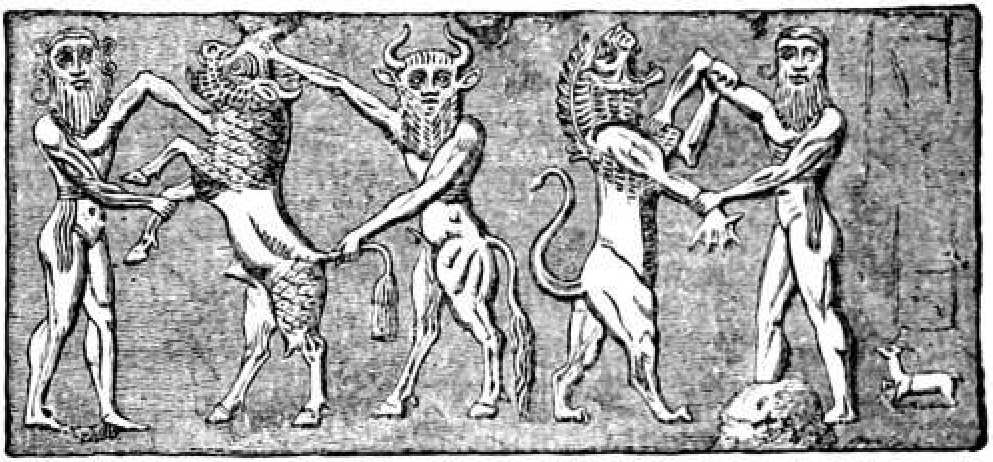


Bowareyeh Mound at Warka (Erech), site of the Temple of Istar.

The struggle with a bull on the part of Izdubar and Hea-bani, represented on the Babylonian cylinder figured on the next page, and numerous similar representations, refer to the struggle with the bull created by Anu to avenge the slight offered to Istar.

It would appear from the broken fragments of Column IV. that Hea-bani laid hold of the bull by the head and tail while Izdubar killed it, and Hea-bani in the engraving is represented holding the bull by its head and tail.

At the close of the sixth tablet the story is again lost, only portions of the third and fourth columns of the next tablet being preserved, but light is thrown on this portion of the narrative by the remarkable tablet describing the descent of Istar into Hades. It is possible that this tablet formed an episode in the sixth tablet of the Izdubar legends.



IZDUBAR AND HEA-BANI IN CONFLICT WITH THE LION AND BULL.

This tablet containing the descent of Istar into Hades was first noticed by Mr. Fox Talbot in the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature," but his attempt at a translation was a failure. Mr. Smith subsequently published a short notice of it in the "North British Review," and afterwards a translation of it in the "Daily Telegraph." Prof. Schrader brought out a monograph upon it in 1874, and both M. Lenormant and Dr. Oppert have worked at it. The most recent translation is one made into Italian by M. Lenormant in a publication entitled "Il mito di Adone-Tammuz," 1879, upon the basis of the one made by Dr. Oppert.

The story of the descent of Istar into Hades is one of the most beautiful myths in the Assyrian inscriptions; it has, however, received so much attention, and been so fully commented upon by various scholars, that little need be said on the subject here.

It is evident that we are dealing with the same goddess as the Istar, daughter of Anu, in the Izdubar legends, although she is here called daughter of Sin (the moon-god).

The description of the region of Hades is most graphic, and vividly portrays the sufferings of the prisoners there. Atsu-sunamir, created by Hea to deliver Istar, is described as a composite animal, half bitch and half man, with more than one head, and corresponds with the two dogs of the Hindu

Rig-Veda, which have four eyes and broad snouts, and guard the road to the abode of Yama the king of the departed. They are also said to move among men, feasting on their lives, as the messengers of Yama; and as the offspring of Saramâ, the dawn, they are called Sârameyas, which Prof. Max Müller compares with the Greek Hermês. At any rate, the same conception of a dog of the dawn which guards the approach to the realm of Hades is found in the Greek Kerberos with his fifty heads (or three heads, according to later writers), as well as in the dog of Geryon named Orthros or “the dawn,” who seems to be identical with the Vedic Vritra the demon of night. It would appear, therefore, that in the primitive mythology both of the Hindus and of the Accadians the “fleet” dawn was likened to a dog, sometimes regarded as carrying men away to the dark under-world, sometimes as bringing light to the under-world itself.

The latter part of the tablet is somewhat obscure, but refers to the custom of lamenting for Dumuzi or Tammuz.

CHAPTER XV.
ILLNESS AND WANDERINGS OF IZDUBAR.

Hea-bani and the trees.—Illness of Izdubar.—Death of Hea-bani.—Journey of Izdubar.—His dream.—Scorpion men.—The Desert of Mas.—Siduri and Sabitu.—Nes-Hea the pilot.—Water of death.—Mua.—The conversation.—Xisuthrus.

OF the three tablets in this section, the first one is very uncertain, and is put together from two separate sources: the other two are more complete and satisfactory.

TABLET VIII.

It is again uncertain if any of this tablet has been discovered; provisionally some fragments of the first, second, third, and sixth columns of a tablet which may belong to it are placed here, but the only fragment worth translating at present is one given in Mr. Smith's "Assyrian Discoveries," p. 176. In some portions of these fragments there are references to the story of Khumbaba, but as the fragment appears to refer to the illness of Izdubar it probably belongs here.

The fourth and fifth columns of this tablet are lost. This part of the legend appears to refer to the illness of Izdubar.

COLUMN VI.

It must here be noted that Mr. Smith's grounds for making this the eighth tablet were extremely doubtful, and it is possible that the fragments are of different tablets; but they fill up an evident blank in the story here, and they are consequently inserted pending further discoveries as to their true position.

In the first column Hea-bani appears to be addressing certain trees, and they are supposed to have the power of hearing and answering him. Hea-bani praises one tree and sneers at another, but from the mutilation of the text it does not appear why he acts so. We may conjecture he was seeking a charm to open a door he mentions, and that according to the story this charm was known to the trees. The fragment of the sixth column shows Hea-bani unable to interpret a dream, while Izdubar asks his friend to fight.

After this happened the violent death of Hea-bani, which added to the misfortunes of Izdubar; but no fragment of this part of the story is preserved.

TABLET IX.

This tablet is in a somewhat better state than the others, and all the narrative is clearer from this point, not a single column of the inscription being entirely lost. The ninth tablet commences with the sorrow of Izdubar at the death of Hea-bani.

COLUMN I.

1. Izdubar over Hea-bani his friend
2. bitterly weeps, and traverses the desert.
3. I have no judgment like Hea-bani here;
4. sickness entered into my stomach;
5. death I feared, and traverse the desert.
6. To the majesty of Xisuthrus, son of Ubara-tutu,
7. the road I am taking, and quickly I go;
8. to the lowlands of the mountains I take (my way) at night.
9. .... a (dream) I saw, and I feared.
10. I (bow) on my face, to Sin (the moon god) I pray;
11. and into the presence of the gods came my supplication;
12. Grant thou (health) to me, even unto me!
13. .... dream.

21. he removed ....
22. the former name ....
23. the new name ....

(About eight lines lost here.)

The second column shows Izdubar in some fabulous region, whither he has wandered in search of Xisuthrus. Here he sees composite monsters with their feet resting in Hades and their heads reaching heaven. These beings are supposed to guide and direct the sun at its rising and setting. This passage is as follows:—

Column II.

1. Of the mountains hearing him as many as ....
2. To the mountain of Masu in his course ....
3. who all day long guard the rising (sun).
4. Their crown was at the lattice of heaven,
5. below Hades was their footing.
6. Scorpion-men guard its gate,
7. burning with terribleness, and their appearance was death,
8. the greatness of their bulk overthrows the forests.
9. At the rising of the sun and the setting of the sun, they guard the sun, and
10. Izdubar saw them and fear and terror seized his face.
11. He took his counsel and approached before them.
12. The scorpion-man of his female asked:
13. Who has gone to us with his body the flesh of the gods?
14. To the scorpion-man his female answered:
15. His going (is) that of a god, but his feeble gait (is) that of a man.
16. The scorpion-man of the hero asked,
17. .... of the gods the word he recounts:
18. .... distant road

19. .... up to the presence
20. .... of which the passage is difficult.
21. .... thy .... thou puttest on.
22. .... mountains situated.
23. .... thou puttest on.

The rest of this column is lost. In it Izdubar converses with the monsters, and where the third column begins he is telling them his purpose of seeking Xisuthrus.

Column III.

(1 and 2 lost.)
3. He Xisuthrus my father .....
4. who has been established also in the assembly (of the gods)
5. death and life [are known to him].
6. The scorpion-man opened his mouth (and spake);
7. they say to Izdubar:
8. Izdubar was not ....
9. of the mountain ....
10. for twelve kaspu (84 miles) [is the journey];
11. on the boundary of the field did he carry himself, and (there is) no light.
12. To the rising sun ....
13. to the setting sun ....
14. to the setting sun ....
15. they descended ....

In this mutilated passage, the monster describes the journey to be taken by Izdubar; there are now many lines wanting, until we come to the fourth column.

Column IV.

1. In (his) sickness ....
2. in difficulty and ....
3. in lamentation and ....
4. again thou ....

5. the scorpion-man ....
6. (said) to Izdubar ....
7. Go Izdubar ....
8. the mountains of Mas ....
9. the mountains, the path (of the Sun) ....
10. may the women ....
11. the great gate of the land ....
12. Izdubar ....
13. for a memorial ....
14. the road of the sun ....
15. 1 kaspu (he went) ....
16. on the boundary of the field ....
17. he was not able (to look behind him).
18. 2 kaspu (he went) ....

This is the bottom of the fourth column; there are five lines lost at the top of the fifth column, and then the narrative reopens; the text is, however, mutilated and doubtful.

COLUMN V.

6. 4 (kaspu he went) ....
7. on the boundary (of the field)....
8. he was not able (to look behind him).
9. 5 kaspu (he went) ....
10. on the boundary of the field ....
11. he was not able (to look behind him).
12. 6 kaspu he went ....
13. on the boundary of the field did he carry himself (and there is no light).
14. He was not able (to look behind him).
15. 7 kaspu (he went) ....
16. on the boundary of the field was it situated and not ....
17. he was not able to look behind him.
18. 8 kaspu like a .... he mounts up;
19. on the boundary of the field (did he carry himself and) there is no light.
20. He was not able to look behind him.

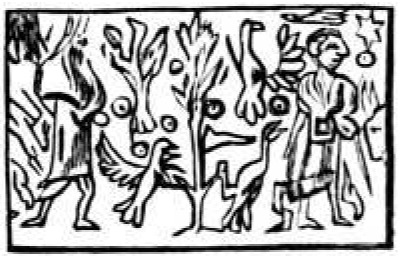
30. to the forest of the trees of the gods in appearance it was equal.



Izdubar among the Trees of the Gods (?) From a Babylonian cylinder found in Cyprus by Gen. di Cesnola.

31. Emeralds it carried as its fruit,
32. the branch refuses not to support a canopy.
33. Crystals they carry as shoots (?)
34. fruit they carry, and to the sight it is glistening.

Some of the words in this fragment are obscure, but the general meaning is clear. In the next column the wanderings of Izdubar are continued, and he comes to a country near the sea. Fragments of several lines of this column are preserved, but too mutilated to translate with certainty. The fragments are:—

Column VI.

(About six lines lost.)

1. the pine tree ....
2. its nest of stone ....
3. not sweeping away the sea .... jet stones

4. like the tree of Elam and the tree of the prince .... emeralds
5. a locust ....
6. jet stone, ka stone .... the goddess Istar
7. like bronze and .... he carried
8. like .... obstacles
9. which .... the sea
10. it has, and .... may he raise
11. Izdubar [saw this] in his travelling,
12. on this sea he carried ....
13. Colophon. The women Siduri and Sabitu (who on the shore) of the sea dwelt.
14. .... tablet of the series: "When the hero Izdubar saw the fountain."

This tablet brings Izdubar to the region of the sea-coast, but his way is then barred by two women, one named Siduri and the other Sabitu. His further adventures are given on the tenth tablet, which opens:

TABLET X.

1. Siduri and Sabitu (who in the land beside the sea)
2. dwelt and ....
3. it was the moon, it was the moon ....
4. a covering of fire (?) ye accomplish.
5. Izdubar approached and ....

8. there is shame of face on ....
9. to go on the distant path his face (was set).
10. Sabitu afar off pondered,
11. she counselled to her heart (this) plan.
12. Within herself also she (considered):
13. What is this message ....
14. May no one come straight in (his path).

---

19. Izdubar to her also even said (to Sabitu:)
20. Sabitu what didst thou see (that)
21. thy gate thou barrest ....
22. I force the door ....

The rest of this column is lost, but it must have described the meeting of Izdubar with a boatman named Ur-Hea or Lig-Hea, called Nes-Hea “the lion” or “dog of Hea” in Assyrian. In the second column they commence a journey by water together in a boat. But little of this column is preserved; two fragments only are given here.

Column II.

10. Explain the tokens of it to me; yea, explain the tokens of it to me.
11. If it be suitable the sea let me cross,
12. if it be not suitable the desert let me traverse.

13. Sabit to him also speaks, even to Izdubar:
14. There was no crossing (of the sea), O Izdubar, at any time,
15. and no one from remote times onwards has crossed the sea.
16. From crossing the sea Samas the hero I the mother prevented; (yet) Samas crossed, whoever

Here there are many lines lost, then recommencing the story proceeds on the third column.

Column III.

1. my friend whom I have loved made ....
2. I am not as he and would we had never gone up ....

---

3. Izdubar to him also speaks, even to Ur-Hea;
4. Again, Ur-Hea, what (is the way to Xisuthrus?)

IZDUBAR, COMPOSITE FIGURES, AND UR-HEA IN THE BOAT; FROM AN EARLY BABYLONIAN CYLINDER.

Here there is a blank, the extent of which is uncertain, and where the narrative recommences it is on a small fragment of the third and fourth columns of another copy. It appears that the lost lines record the meeting between Izdubar and a female being named Mu-seri-ina-namari, or the "Waters of dawn at daylight." In the account of the Deluge, Mu-seri-ina-namari is mentioned as bringing the black clouds from the horizon of heaven. It was here, beyond the circular boundary of the earth, and on the shores of the ocean which surrounded it, that Izdubar is now supposed to be.

It is curious that, whenever Izdubar speaks to this being, the name Mua is used, while, whenever Izdubar is spoken to, the full name Mu-seri-ina-namari occurs. Where the story reopens Izdubar is informing Mua of his first connection with Hea-bani and his offers to him when he desired him to come to Erech.

The speech of Mua to Izdubar and the rest of the column are lost, the narrative recommencing on Column V. with another speech of Izdubar.

Here the record is again mutilated, but Izdubar further informs Mua what he did in conjunction with Hea-bani. Where the story reopens on Column VI. Izdubar relates part of their adventure with Khumbaba.

Here again our narrative is lost, and where we again meet the story Izdubar is conversing with Xisuthrus. The conversation is contained in the broken fifth column of K 3382, first noticed and copied by Mr. Pinches.

21. (I) am not as he, and would we had never gone up; I did not make a fortress ....

22. Izdubar to him also speaks, even to Xisuthrus:

23. Thus may I go and Xisuthrus afar off, who has conversed with him, may I see.
24. I went round, I went through all countries;
25. I passed through difficult lands;
26. I crossed all seas.
27. A good .... they did not dwell before me.
28. I exhausted myself through weakness; with my .... the crown I filled.
29. .... the house I did not reach, and my clothing was decayed.
30. .... of a leopard, a tiger, a raging winged bull ....
31. their (lairs) I approached; their skins I stripped off ....
32. .... may they bar its gate; with much bitumen ....
33. .... the contents ....
34. .... the sides ....

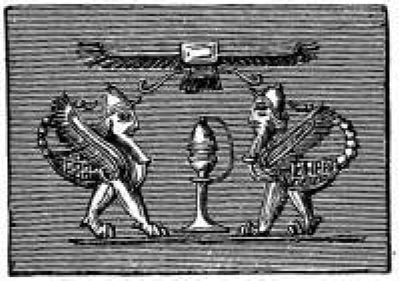
---

35. (Xisuthrus) to him speaks, even to Izdubar:
36. .... O Izdubar, sickness ....
37. .... gods and men ....
38. .... thy (father) and thy mother made ....

We now come to a fragment which forms the reverse of the tablet already translated, and recounts the visit of Izdubar to the two women Siduri and Sabitu. This reads as follows:—

1. I was angry (?) ....
2. If at any time we built a house, if ever we establish ....
3. If ever brothers fixed ....
4. If ever hatred is in ....
5. If ever the river makes a (great) flood.
6. (If ever) reviling within the mouth ....
7. the face that will bow before Samas ....
8. from of old is not ....
9. Spoiling and death together ....
10. of death the image they guarded not ....
11. The man or servant on approaching (death),
12. the spirits of the earth the great gods are they.
13. The goddess Mammetu maker of fate, to them their fate brings,

14. she has fixed death and life;
15. of death its days are not known.



COMPOSITE FIGURES (SCORPION MEN); FROM AN ASSYRIAN CYLINDER.

This statement closes the tenth tablet and leads to the next question of Izdubar and its answer, which includes the story of the Flood.

The present division of the legends has its own peculiar difficulties; in the first place it does not appear how Hea-bani was killed. Possibly he fell in an attempt to slay a lion.

The land of Mas or desert of Mas over which Izdubar travels in this tablet is the desert on the west of the Euphrates, and the name reminds us of the Biblical Mash who is called a son of Aram in Genesis x. 23; on the sixth column the fragments appear to refer to some bird with magnificent feathers like precious stones, seen by Izdubar on his journey.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE STORY OF THE FLOOD AND CONCLUSION.

Eleventh tablet.—The gods.—Sin of the world.—Command to build the ark.—Its contents.—The building.—The Flood.—Destruction of people.—Fear of the gods.—End of Deluge.—Nizir.—Resting of ark.—The birds.—The descent from the ark.—The sacrifice, covenant, and rainbow.—Speeches of gods.—Translation of Adra-Khasis.—Cure of Izdubar.—His return.—Lament over Hea-bani.—Resurrection of Hea-bani.—Burial of warrior.—Age and composition of the Deluge tablet.—Comparison with Genesis.—Syrian nation.—Connection of legends.—Points of contact.—Duration of Deluge.—Mount of descent.—Ten generations.—Early cities.

THE eleventh tablet of the Izdubar series is the one which first attracted attention, and is certainly the most important on account of its containing the story of the Flood. This tablet is the most perfect in the series, scarcely any line being entirely lost. A new fragment of it, belonging to another edition of the story, has been recently brought to the museum by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam.

TABLET XI.

COLUMN I.

1. (Izdubar) to him also speaks even to Xisuthrus afar off:
2. O Xisuthrus,
3. (why) dost thou not again (to me) as I (to thee)?
4. (why) dost thou not again (to me) as I (to thee)?
5. .... my heart to make war
6. .... I come up after thee,
7. when thou didst take, and in the assembly of the gods didst obtain life.

---

8. Xisuthrus to him also speaks, even to Izdubar:
9. Let me reveal to thee (Izdubar) the story of my preservation,

10. and the judgment of the gods let me relate to thee.
11. The city Surippak the city which thou knowest on the Euphrates is placed,
12. that city is ancient and the gods are within it.
13. To make a deluge [or whirlwind] the great gods have brought their heart;
14. even he their father, Anu,
15. their king, the warrior Bel,
16. their throne-bearer, Ninip,
17. their minister, the lord of Hades, Nin-si-kha (wife of) Hea with them sat, and
18. their will he (i.e. Hea) repeated: to his minister the minister of the city of Kis, he declared what he had (in mind);[28]
19. his minister heard and proclaimed attentively:
20. Man of Surippak, son of Ubara-tutu,
21. build a house, make a ship to preserve the sleep of plants (and) living beings;
22. store the seed and vivify life,
23. cause also the seed of life of every kind to go up into the midst of the ship.
24. The ship which thou shalt make,
25. 600 cubits (shall be) its measure in length,
26. 60 cubits the amount of its breadth and its height.
27. ... and on the deep cover it, even it, with a roof.
28. I understood and say to Hea my lord:
29. The building of the ship which thou commandest thus,
30. .... I shall have made,
31. .... the sons of the host and the old men.
32. (Hea opened his mouth and) speaks and says to me his servant:
33. ...... thou shalt say unto them,
34. ...... he has rejected me and
35. ...... it is upon me
36. .... like caves ....
37. ... may I judge above and below ....
38. ... close the ship ...
39. ... at the season which I will make known to you,
40. into it enter and the door of the ship turn.

41. Into the midst of it thy grain, thy furniture, thy goods,
42. thy wealth, thy woman slaves, thy handmaids, and the sons of the host,
43. (the beasts) of the field, the wild animals of the field, as many as I would protect,
44. I will send to thee, and thy door shall guard (them).

45. Adrakhasis[29] his mouth opened and speaks, and
46. says to Hea his lord:
47. No one a ship has made ...
48. in the lower part of the ship has shut up ....
49. .... and may I see the ship ....
50. .... in the lower part of the ship ....
51. the building of the ship which thou commandest me (thus),
52. which in ....

COLUMN II.

1. strong ....
2. on the fifth day .... it rose.
3. In its circuit 14 in all (were) its girders.
4. 14 in all it contained ... above it
5. I placed its roof; it .... I enclosed it.
6. I rode in it the sixth time; I divided its passages the seventh time;
7. its interior I divided the eighth time.
8. Leaks for the waters within it I cut off.
9. I saw the rents and the wanting parts I added.
10. 3[30] sari of bitumen I poured over the outside.
11. 3[30] sari of bitumen I poured over the inside.
12. 3 sari of men carrying baskets, who carried on their heads food.
13. I added a saros of food which the people should eat;
14. two sari of food the boatmen shared.
15. To .... I sacrificed oxen
16. I (established) .... each day
17. I (established) .... beer, food, and wine;
18. (I collected them) like the waters of a river, and
19. (I collected) like the dust of the earth, and

20. (in the ship) the food with my hand I placed.
21. (Through the help of) Samas the seaworthiness of the ship was accomplished.
22. ... they were strong and
23. the tackling of the ship I caused to bring above and below.
24. .... they went in two-thirds of it.

25. All I possessed I collected it, all I possessed I collected it in silver,
26. all I possessed I collected it in gold,
27. all I possessed I collected it in the seed of life of all kinds.
28. I caused everything to go up into the ship, my slaves and my handmaids,
29. the beast of the field, the wild animal of the field, the sons of the people all of them, I caused to go up.
30. The season Samas fixed and
31. he spake saying: In the night I will cause it to rain from heaven heavily,
32. enter into the midst of the ship and shut thy door.
33. That season came round (of which)
34. he spake saying: In the night I will cause it to rain from heaven heavily.
35. Of the day I reached its evening,
36. the day of watching fear I had.
37. I entered into the midst of the ship and shut my door.
38. On closing the ship to Buzur-sadi-rabi the boatman
39. the habitation I gave with its goods.

40. Mu-seri-ina-namari
41. arose, from the horizon of heaven a black cloud.
42. Rimmon in the midst of it thundered, and
43. Nebo and the Wind-god went in front,
44. the throne-bearers went over the mountain and plain,
45. Nergal the mighty removes the wicked,
46. Ninip goes in front, he casts down,
47. the spirits of earth carried destruction,
48. in their terror they shake the earth;
49. of Rimmon his flood reached to heaven.

50. The darkened (earth to a waste) was turned,

COLUMN III.

1. the surface of the earth like .... they covered,
2. (it destroyed all) living beings from the face of the earth;
3. the raging (deluge) over the people, reached to heaven.
4. Brother saw not his brother, men did not know one another. In heaven
5. the gods feared the whirlwind and
6. sought a refuge; they ascended to the heaven of Anu.
7. The gods like dogs were fixed, in a heap did they lie down.
8. Spake Istar like a child,
9. the great goddess uttered her speech:
10. All to clay are turned and
11. that which I in the presence of the gods prophesied (even evil has happened).
12. As I prophesied in the presence of the gods evil,
13. to evil (were devoted) all my people, the trouble I prophesied thus:
14. I the mother have begotten my people, and
15. like the young of the fishes they fill the sea. And
16. the gods because of the spirits of earth are weeping with me.
17. The gods on seats are seated in lamentation,
18. covered were their lips for the coming evil.
19. Six days and nights
20. passed, the wind, the whirlwind, (and) the storm, overwhelmed.
21. On the seventh day at its approach the rain was stayed, the raging whirlwind
22. which had smitten like an earthquake,
23. was quieted. The sea began to dry, and the wind and deluge ended.
24. I watched the sea making a noise,
25. and the whole of mankind was turned to clay,
26. like reeds the corpses floated.
27. I opened the window, and the light smote upon the fortress of my nostrils.
28. I was grieved and sat down; I weep,
29. over the fortress of my nostrils went my tears.

30. I watched the regions at the boundary of the sea,
31. towards all the twelve points of the compass (there was) no land.
32. In the country of Nizir rested the ship;
33. the mountain of Nizir stopped the ship, and to pass over it it was not able.
34. The first day, the second day, the mountain of Nizir stopped the ship.
35. The third day, the fourth day, the mountain of Nizir stopped the ship.
36. The fifth day, the sixth day, the mountain of Nizir stopped the ship.
37. On the seventh day at its approach

38. I sent forth a dove and it left. The dove went, it returned, and
39. a resting-place it did not find, and it came back.
40. I sent forth a swallow and it left. The swallow went, it returned, and
41. a resting-place it did not find, and it came back.
42. I sent forth a raven and it left.
43. The raven went, and the carrion on the water it saw, and
44. it did eat, it swam, and turned away, it did not come back.
45. I sent (the animals) forth to the four winds, I sacrificed a sacrifice,
46. I built an altar on the peak[31] of the mountain,
47. by sevens vessels I placed,
48. at the bottom of them I spread reeds, pines, and juniper.
49. The gods smelt the savour, the gods smelt the good savour;
50. the gods like flies over the sacrificer gathered.
51. From afar also the great goddess at her approach
52. lifted up the mighty arches (i.e. the rainbow) which Anu had created as his glory.
53. The crystal of those gods before me (i.e. the rainbow) never may I forget;

Column IV.

1. those days I devised with longing that I might never forget.

2. ‘May the gods come to my altar,
3. may Bel never come to my altar,
4. for he did not consider and had made a whirlwind,
5. and my people he consigned to the abyss.’
6. From afar also Bel at his approach
7. saw, the ship he stopped; Bel was filled with anger against the gods and the spirits of heaven:
8. ‘Let no one come out alive, never may a man live in the abyss.’
9. Ninip his mouth opened, and spake; he says to the warrior Bel:
10. ‘Who is it except Hea that forms a resolution?
11. and Hea knows and all things he ...’
12. Hea his mouth opened and spake, he says to the warrior Bel:
13. ‘Thou messenger of the gods, warrior,
14. as thou didst not consider a deluge thou madest.
15. The doer of sin bore his sin, the blasphemer bore his blasphemy.
16. Never may the just prince be cut off, never may the faithful (be destroyed).
17. Instead of thy making a deluge, may lions come and men be diminished;
18. instead of thy making a deluge, may hyænas come and men be diminished;
19. instead of thy making a deluge, may a famine happen and the country be (destroyed);
20. instead of thy making a deluge, may pestilence come and men be destroyed.
21. I did not reveal the judgment of the gods.
22. To Adrakhasis (Xisuthrus) a dream I sent, and the judgment of the gods he heard.’
23. Again also Bel considers, (literally, again consideration was considered); he approaches the midst of the ship.
24. He took my hand and caused me to ascend up,
25. he caused (me) to ascend; he united my wife to my side;
26. he turned unto us and fixes himself in covenant with us; he approaches us:
27. ‘Formerly Adrakhasis (was) mortal, but
28. again also Adrakhasis and his wife to live as gods are taken away, and

29. Adrakhasis also dwells in a remote place at the mouth of the rivers.'
30. They took me, and in a remote place at the mouth of the rivers they caused me to dwell.
31. Again also as for thee whomsoever the gods have chosen also,
32. for the health which thou seekest and askest,
33. the bulwarks shall be mounted six days and seven nights,
34. like one who sits in the vicinity of his nest,
35. a way like a storm shall be laid upon him.
36. Adrakhasis to her also says, even to his wife:
37. I announce that the chief who has sought health
38. the way like a storm shall be laid upon him.
39. His wife to him also says even to Adrakhasis afar off:
40. Turn him, and let the man be sent away;
41. by the road that he came may he return in peace,
42. thro' the great gate going forth let him return to his country.
43. Adrakhasis to her also says, even to his wife:
44. The pain of the man pains thee,
45. mount the bulwarks; his baldness place on his head.
46. And the day when he had mounted the side of the ship,
47. she mounted, his baldness she placed on his head.
48. And the day when he had mounted the side of the ship,
49. first the sabusat of his baldness,
50. second the mussukat, third the radbat, fourth she opened his zikaman,
51. fifth the sibu she placed, sixth the bassat,

COLUMN V.

1. seventh in the outlet she turned him and let the man go free.

---

2. Izdubar to him also says even to Xisuthrus afar off:
3. In this way thou wast compassionate (?) over me,
4. quickly thou hast begotten me, and thou hast set eyes (on me).
5. Xisuthrus to him also says even to Izdubar.
6. .... thy baldness,
7. .... I separated thee,

8. .... thy baldness,
9. second the mussukat, third the radbat,
10. fourth I opened thy zikaman,
11. fifth the sibu I placed, sixth the bassat,
12. seventh in the opening I turned thee.
13. Izdubar to him also says even to Xisuthrus afar off:
14. ...... Xisuthrus whither may I go?
15. ...... they shipped
16. ...... dwelling in death,
17. ...... his tail dies also.

18. Xisuthrus to him also says even to Nis-Hea the boatman:
19. Nis-Hea, may thy (oar) accomplish a passage for thee.
20. He who ..... on the shore of (the gods) ....
21. the man whom thou goest before, disease has covered his body;
22. illness has overmastered the strength of his limbs.
23. Take him, Nis-Hea, to cleanse carry him,
24. may he cleanse his disease in the water like purity,
25. may he cast off his illness, and may the sea carry it away, may health cover his skin,
26. may it restore the hair of his head,
27. the hair clothing, the covering of his loins.
28. That he may go to his country, that he may take his road,
29. never may the hair become old and alone may he be alone (i.e. unrivalled).
30. Nis-Hea took him, to cleanse he carried him,
31. his disease in the water like purity (beauty) he cleansed,
32. he cast off his illness, and the sea carried it away, health covered his skin,
33. the hair of his head was restored, the hair clothing the covering of his loins.
34. That he might go to his country, that he might take his road,
35. the hair he did not cast off, but alone he was alone.
36. Izdubar and Nis-Hea rode in the ship,
37. where he had placed them they rode.

38. His wife to him also says even to Xisuthrus afar off:

39. Izdubar goes away, he is at rest, he performs
40. what thou hast given (him to do), and returns to his country.
41. And he even Izdubar lifted up the oar (?);
42. the ship touched the shore.
43. Xisuthrus to him also says even to Izdubar:
44. Izdubar, thou goest away, thou art at rest, thou performest
45. what I gave thee (to do), and thou returnest to thy country.
46. Let the story of my preservation be revealed, O Izdubar,
47. and let the judgment of the gods be related to thee.
48. This account (?) like ....
49. its renown (?) like the Amurdin tree ....
50. if he takes the whole of it in the hand ....
51. To Izdubar he revealed this in his hearing, and ....
52. he bound together heavy stones ....

COLUMN VI.

1. they dragged it and to the deep ....
2. he even Izdubar took the animal ....
3. he cut the heavy stones ....
4. one homer he poured out in libation to it for his ship.

5. Izdubar to him also says even to Nis-Hea, the boatman:
6. O Nis-Hea, the whole of this, even the whole of the story,
7. of which a man in his heart shall take its story,
8. may he bring it to the midst of Erech the lofty, may he complete (it) like ....
9. .... splendour (which) is diminished ....
10. May I record and return to perform my vengeance (?).
11. For 10 kaspu (70 miles) they journeyed the stage, for 20 kaspu (140 miles) they made hostility;
12. Izdubar saw a well which the waters were excavating.
13. He turned to the bright waters and smells (?) the waters; .... grant me thy image (?)
14. .... the men he approached and (their) goods he took away (?)
15. at his return they tore the hair.
16. Izdubar approached (?) ....

17. over the fortress of his nostrils coursed his tears, and he says to Nis-Hea the boatman:
18. What is it to me, Nis-Hea, that my hands rest?
19. What is it to me that my heart lives?
20. I have not done good to my own self;
21. and yet the lion of the earth does good (to himself).
22. Again for 20 kaspu (140 miles) alone I take the way, and
23. when I had opened the .... I heaped up the tackling,
24. the sea against its long wall I urged.
25. And he left the ship by the shore, 20 kaspu (140 miles) they journeyed the stage.
26. For 30 kaspu (210 miles) they performed the labour, they came into the midst of Erech the lofty.

27. Izdubar to him also says, even to Nis-Hea the boatman:
28. Ascend, Nis-Hea, over the fortress of Erech go;
29. the foundation-stone is scattered, the bricks of its interior are not made,
30. and its foundation is not laid to thy height (?);
31. 1 saros (is) thy city, 1 saros the plantations, 1 saros the boundary of the temple of Nantur the house of Istar,
32. 3 sari together the city of Erech ...

The opening line of the next tablet is preserved, it reads: “The gad-fly in the house of the serving-man was left.” After this the story is again lost for several lines, and where it reappears Izdubar is mourning for Hea-bani.

The fragments of this tablet are:—

COLUMN I.

1. The gad-fly in the house of the serving-man was left.

(Several lines lost.)

1. Izdubar (lamented thus over Hea-bani his friend:)
2. If to ....

3. to happiness thou (art not admitted);
4. a shining cloak (thou dost not wear),
5. like a misfortune (?) thou ....
6. Fat (and) goodly food thou dost not share;
7. to (come to) its savour they do not choose thee.
8. The bow against the ground thou dost not aim,
9. what the bow has struck escapes thee:
10. the staff to thy hands thou dost not lift,
11. the captive will not curse thee:
12. sandals to thy feet thou dost not bind,
13. a thrust against the ground thou dost not make.
14. Thy wife whom thou lovest thou dost not kiss,
15. thy wife whom thou hatest thou dost not strike;
16. thy child whom thou lovest thou dost not kiss,
17. thy child whom thou hatest thou dost not strike.
18. The destruction of the earth has seized thee.
19. Ninazu, of darkness the mother, of darkness, of darkness,
20. her illustrious stature as his mantle covers him, and
21. her feet like a deep well beget [or darken] him.

This is the bottom of the first column. The next column has lost all the upper part: it appears to have contained the remainder of this lament, an appeal to one of the gods on behalf of Hea-bani, and a repetition of the lamentation, the third person being used instead of the second. The fragments commence in the middle of this:

1. his wife whom he hates he strikes,
2. his child whom he loves he kisses;
3. his child whom he has hated he strikes,
4. the destruction of the earth takes him.
5. Ninazu, of darkness the mother of darkness, of darkness!
6. Her illustrious stature as a mantle covers him,
7. her feet like a deep well beget him.
8. Lo! Hea-bani from the earth to .....
9. The plague-demon did not take him, fever did not take him, the earth took him.

10. The resting-place of Nergal the unconquered did not take him, the earth took him.
11. The place of the battle of heroes did not strike him, the earth took him.
12. Lo! .... ni son of the goddess Ninsun[32] for his servant Hea-bani wept;
13. to the house of Bel alone he went.
14. “Father Bel, a gad-fly to the earth struck me,
15. a deadly wound to the earth struck me,”

COLUMN III.

1. Hea-bani who to rest (was not admitted),
2. the plague-demon did not take him, (the earth took him);
3. the resting-place of Nergal the unconquered did not take him, (the earth took him).
4. In the place of the battle of heroes they did not (strike him, the earth took him).
5. Father Bel, a judgment did not take him.
6. Father Sin, the gad-fly (struck him);
7. a deadly wound (to the earth struck him).
8. Hea-bani who to rest (was not admitted),
9. the plague-demon did not take him, (the earth took him);
10. the resting-place of Nergal (the unconquered did not take him).
(About 12 lines lost, containing a repetition of this passage.)
23. The plague-demon ....
24. the resting-place of Nergal the unconquered (did not take him);
25. the place of the battle of heroes did not (take him).
26. Father Hea ....
27. To the warrior Merodach ....
28. Heroic warrior (Merodach) ....
29. he created him the word ....
30. the spirit ....
31. To his father ....
32. the heroic warrior Merodach (son of Hea)
33. created him the word, the earth opened, and
34. the spirit (or ghost) of Hea-bani like dust from the earth (arose):

35. ..... and thou explainest,
36. he pondered and repeated this:

Column IV.

1. Tell, my friend, tell, my friend,
2. the secrets of the earth which thou hast seen, tell (me).
3. I cannot tell thee, my friend, I cannot tell thee,
4. (how) can I tell thee the secrets of the earth which I have seen?
5. ..... I sit weeping
6. ..... may I sit and may I weep
7. ..... of growth and thy heart rejoiced
8. ..... thou growest old, the worm entered
9. ..... of youth and thy heart rejoiced
10. ..... dust filling
11. ..... he passed over
12. ..... he passed over
13. ..... I saw

Here there is a serious blank in the inscription, about twenty lines being lost, and Mr. Smith has conjecturally inserted a fragment which appears to belong to this part of the narrative. It is very curious from the geographical names it contains.

1. .... I poured out ....
2. .... which thou trusted ....
3. .... city of Babylon ri ....
4. .... which he was blessed ....
5. .... may he mourn for my fault ....
6. .... may he mourn for him and for ....
7. .... Kisu and Kharsak-kalama, may he mourn .....
8. .... his .... Cutha ....
9. .... Eridu? and Nipur ....

The rest of Column IV. is lost, and of the next column there are only remains of the first two lines.

Column V.

1. like a good prince who ....
2. like ....

Here there are about thirty lines missing, the story recommencing with Column VI., which is perfect.

COLUMN VI.

1. On a couch he reclines and
2. pure water drinks.
3. He who in battle is slain, thou seest and I see.
4. His father (and) his mother (support) his head,
5. (and) his wife addresses the corpse.
6. His friends in the field (are standing),
7. thou seest and I see.
8. His spoil on the ground is uncovered,
9. of his spoil he has no oversight.
10. Thou seest and I see.
11. His tender orphans long for bread; the food
12. which in the tents is placed is eaten.

XISUTHRUS OR NOAH AND IZDUBAR; FROM AN EARLY BABYLONIAN CYLINDER.

This passage closes the great Epic of the ancient Chaldeans, which even in its present mutilated form is of the greatest importance in relation to the civilization, manners, and customs of that early people. The main feature in this part of the Izdubar legends is the description of the Flood in the eleventh tablet, which evidently refers to the same event as the Flood of Noah in Genesis.

The episode of the Flood has been introduced into the Izdubar Epic in accordance with the principle upon which it has been formed. The eleventh tablet or book answers to the sign of Aquarius and the month called “the rainy” by the Accadians, and it was therefore rightly occupied by the story of the Flood. The compiler of the Epic seems to have used for this purpose two independent poems relating to the event; at least it is otherwise difficult to account for the repetitions observable in certain lines which sometimes differ slightly from one another, as well as for certain inconsistencies which the skill of the compiler has not been able entirely to remove. Thus according to I. 13, the Deluge was caused by all “the great gods;” according to II. 30, by Samas only; according to IV. 4, 5, by Bel. There is little doubt that many independent versions of the history of the Deluge were current in a poetical form; indeed, a fragment of one of these, containing the original Accadian text along with the Assyrian translation has been preserved, and the version found in Berosus differs in several notable points from the version embodied in the great Chaldean Epic.

The fragment of the variant version of which the Accadian text has been preserved is as follows:—

1. .... then like a bowl of sacrificial wine the mountain ....
2. .... country to country ran together.
3. The female-slave to her mother (?) it had caused to ascend.
4. The freeman from the house of his fecundity it had caused to go forth.
5. The son from the house of his father it had caused to go forth
6. The doves from their cotes had fled away.
7. The raven on its wing it had caused to ascend.
8. The swallow from his nest it had caused to depart.
9. The oxen it had scattered, the lambs it had scattered.
10. (It was) the great days when the evil spirits hunt.
11. The universe they subjected unto themselves.
12. Among the bricks of the foundations (they dealt destruction).
13. The earth like a potsherd (they shattered).

14. Bel and Beltis the supreme ones the mighty tablets (of destiny consulted).
15. The foot to the earth they did not (put).
16. The highways of the earth they did not (tread).

If we compare the Babylonian account of the Deluge contained in the Epic with the account in Genesis we shall find some differences between them; but if we consider the differences that existed between the two countries of Palestine and Babylonia these variations do not appear greater than we should expect. Chaldea was essentially a mercantile and maritime country, well watered and flat, while Palestine was a hilly region with no great rivers, and the Jews were shut out from the coast, the maritime regions being mostly in the hands of the Philistines and Phœnicians. There was a total difference between the religious ideas of the two peoples, the Jews believing in one God, the creator and lord of the Universe, while the Babylonians worshipped gods and lords many, every city having its local deity, and these being joined by complicated relations in a poetical mythology, which was in marked contrast to the severe simplicity of the Jewish system. With such differences it was only natural that, in relating the same stories, each nation should colour them in accordance with its own ideas, and stress would naturally in each case be laid upon points with which they were familiar. Thus we should expect beforehand that there would be differences in the narrative such as we actually find, and we may also notice that the cuneiform account does not always coincide even with the account of the same events given by Berosus from Chaldean sources, from which, as already observed, we may infer that there was more than one version of the story of the Deluge current in Babylonia itself.

The great value of the inscriptions describing the Flood consists in the fact that they form an independent testimony to the Biblical narrative at a much earlier date than any other evidence. The principal points in the two narratives compared in their order will serve to show the correspondences and differences between the two. It must, however, be remembered that the Biblical narrative is composed of two different accounts of the Flood, generally known as the Elohistic and Jehovistic, and, as M. Lenormant has observed, it is with the union of the two in our present Hebrew text rather than with either one of them alone that the Babylonian version corresponds.

The repetitions observable in the Hebrew text are not to be found in the cuneiform text.

25. The translation of the patriarch (in Genesis of Enoch)	v. 24.	iv. 28-30.

One of the first points that strike us on comparing the Biblical and cuneiform accounts together is that they both agree in representing the Flood as a punishment for the sins of mankind. This agreement is rendered remarkable by the absence of such a moral cause in the legends of a deluge current among other nations; it is wanting even in the version of the Babylonian account given by Berosus. Equally remarkable is the agreement of the two accounts in the narrative of the sending forth of the birds, two of which, the raven and the dove, are the same in both. Some of the actual phrases and words found in Genesis are also found in the cuneiform tablet; though sometimes they are modified, as when Genesis says of the entrance of Noah into the ark: “The Lord shut him in;” whereas in the Babylonian narrative the closing of the door is ascribed to Xisuthrus himself.

Positive discrepancies, however, occur between the two records. Thus they differ as regards the size of the ark. According to the cuneiform account, its length and breadth were in the proportion of ten to one and the height and breadth were the same; but the Bible makes the proportion as six to one, and describes the height as being thirty cubits and the breadth fifty. The version of the story given by Berosus, on the other hand, agrees in this matter neither with Genesis nor with the tablet from Erech. It measures the ark by stadia and not by cubits, makes the proportion of its length and breadth as five to two, and says nothing of the height.

Another difference may be found in the description of the patriarch who escapes the Flood. Xisuthrus is a king who enters the ark with his servants, people, and pilot, while in the Bible only Noah and his family are saved. So, too, no reference is made in the Babylonian account to the distinction between the clean and unclean animals mentioned by the Jehovist, though seven was a sacred number among the Babylonians. The most remarkable difference, however, between the two accounts is with respect to the duration of the Deluge. On this point the inscription gives seven days for the Flood, and seven days for the resting of the ark on the mountain, while the Elohist puts the commencement of the Flood on the 17th day of the second month (Marchesvan) and its termination on the 27th day of the second month in the following year, making a total duration of one lunar year and eleven days. This exactly accords with the climatic conditions of Babylonia, where the rains begin at the end of November. The Euphrates and Tigris then begin to rise, the country is inundated in March, the seventh month of the Hebrew narrative, and from the end of May onwards the waters go down. According to the Jehovist, however, the Deluge is announced to Noah only seven days before it takes place; the waters are at their height for forty days and then decrease during another forty days, after which the patriarch sends out the birds at intervals of seven days, so that it was not till twenty-one days after he has first opened the window that he finally leaves the ark. This is in practical agreement with the cuneiform account, since seven was a sacred number among the Babylonians just as forty is in the Old Testament. As M. Lenormant points out, the date of the 15th of Dæsius (or May) given by Berosus must be due to a scribe's error, since this would place the Flood at a time when the waters were going down. There is again a difference as to the mountain on which the ark rested; Nizir, the place mentioned in the cuneiform text, being east of Assyria, and its mountain, also called "the mountain of the world" where the gods were supposed to dwell, being the present peak of Elwend, while the mountains of Ararat mentioned in the Bible were north of Assyria, near Lake Van. It is evident that different traditions have placed the mountain of the ark in totally different positions, and there is not positive proof as to which is the earlier traditionary spot. The word Ararat is connected with a word Urdhu, meaning "highland," and might be a general term for any part of the hilly country to the north-east of Assyria.

It is interesting to find references in the Jehovistic account to the sacred Babylonian number seven and the seven-day week. Just as Xisuthrus set vessels by sevens on the altar of sacrifice, so Noah offered clean beasts and fowls which had been taken by sevens into the ark. And the narrative of the sending-out of the birds contains a clear reference to the seven-day week, which was known from very early times to the Accadians, who had named each day after one of the seven planets. The Sabbath also, which occurred on the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st and 28th days of the lunar month, was rigorously observed by them. They called it "a day of completion of labours," or "a day unlawful to work upon," and a sort of saints' calendar for the month of the intercalatory Elul says that upon it "the shepherd of many peoples may not eat the flesh of birds (?) or cooked fruit. The garments of his body he must not change. White robes he may not put on. Sacrifice he may not offer. The king in his chariot may not ride. He may not legislate in royal fashion. A place of garrison the general by word of mouth may not appoint. Medicine for the sickness of the body one may not apply." The very word Sabattu or Sabbath was used by the Assyrians, and a bilingual tablet explains it as "a day of rest for the heart."

One striking difference between the descriptions of the Deluge given in the Old Testament and in the Epic of Izdubar is due to the fact that the Hebrews were an inland people, whereas the Accadians were a maritime, or rather fluviatile one. Hence it is that while the ark is called in the Babylonian version "a ship," it is called têbâh, that is, "a coffer" in Genesis. In Genesis, too, nothing is said about launching the ark, testing its seaworthiness, or entrusting it to a pilot. However, the narrative in Genesis preserves a recollection of the bitumen for which the Babylonian plain was famous, and like the cuneiform narrative states that the ark was pitched.

Some of the other differences observable in the two accounts are evidently due to the opposite religious systems of the two countries, but there is again a curious point in connection with the close of the Chaldean legend: this is the translation of the hero of the Flood.

In the Book of Genesis it is not Noah but the seventh patriarch Enoch who is translated, three generations before the Flood.

There appears to have been some connection or confusion between Enoch and Noah in ancient tradition; both are holy men, and Enoch is said, like Noah, to have predicted the Flood.

It is a curious fact that the dynasty of gods, with which Egyptian mythical history commences, resembles in some respects the list of antediluvian kings of Babylonia given by Berosus as well as the list of antediluvian patriarchs in Genesis.

This dynasty has sometimes seven, sometimes ten reigns, and in the Turin Papyrus of kings, which gives ten reigns, there is the same name for the seventh and tenth kings, both being called Horus, and the seventh king is stated to have reigned 300 years, which is the length of life of the seventh patriarch Enoch after the birth of his son.

Here are the three lists of Egyptian gods, Hebrew patriarchs, and Chaldean kings.

Egypt.	Patriarchs.	Chaldean Kings.
Ptah.	Adam.	Alorus.
Ra.	Seth.	Alaparus.
Su.	Enos.	Almelon.
Seb.	Cainan.	Ammenon.
Hosiri.	Mahalaleel.	Amegalarus.
Set.	Jared.	Daonus. (Dun in the inscriptions.)
Hor.	Enoch.	Ædorachus.
Tut.	Methuselah.	Amempsin.
Ma.	Lamech.	Otiartes (Opartes).
Hor.	Noah.	Xisuthrus.

It is well known that Enos, like Adam, signifies “man;” hence some writers have supposed that the list of Noah’s ancestors was originally counted from Enos, so that Lamech, Noah’s father, would have been the seventh in descent. There is, moreover, a curious resemblance between the names of the descendants of Seth and those of the descendants of Cain, Methuselah, indeed, being apparently more correctly written Methusael (Gen. iv. 18), which is the Assyrian Mutu-sa-ili, “Man of God.” Now Lamech, the descendant of Cain, is the seventh from Adam. It may be noticed that Irad or Jared is the same word as the Assyrian Arad, “servant,” and Arad or Ardutu is the Assyrian rendering of the Accadian Ubara, the first part of the name of the father of Xisuthrus, who is actually called Ardates by Abydenus.

Mr. George Smith believed that the real connection between the traditions of Babylonia and Palestine would never be cleared up until the literature of the Syrian population which intervened is recovered. It is very possible that light may be thrown upon the question by the excavations now being made at Jerablus, the site of Carchemish, the capital of the ancient Hittites. Terah may be the same word as Tarkhu, who seems to have been worshipped as a god by the Hittites; and Lucian has preserved a legend of the Flood and the patriarch Sisythes, who is evidently the Xisuthrus of the Babylonians, which was current at Hierapolis or Mabug, a little to the south of Jerablus. In this legend the ark has become a coffer, Sisythes and his family are alone preserved, and the Flood was sent to punish the wickedness of mankind.

There is one point which still deserves notice: these traditions are not fixed to any localities in or near Palestine, but even on the showing of the Jews themselves, belong to the neighbourhood of the Euphrates valley, and Babylonia in particular; this of course is clearly stated in the Babylonian inscriptions and traditions.

Eden, according even to the Jews, was by the Euphrates and Tigris; the cities of Babylon, Larancha, and Sippara were supposed by the Babylonians to have been founded before the Flood. Surippak was the city of the ark, the mountains east of the Tigris were the resting-place of the ark, Babylon was the site of the tower, and Ur of the Chaldees the birthplace of Abraham. These facts and the further statement that Abraham, the father and first leader of the Hebrew race, migrated from Ur to Harran in Syria, and from thence to Palestine, are all so much evidence in favour of the hypothesis that Chaldea was the original home of these stories, and that the Jews received them originally from the Babylonians; but on the other hand there are such striking differences in some parts of the legends, particularly in the names of the patriarchs before the Flood, that it is evident further information is required before we can determine how or when they were received by the Jews.

To pass, now, to the twelfth tablet of the Izdubar Epic, a curious fragment has been provisionally placed by Mr. Smith in the fourth column, in which Izdubar appears to call on his cities to mourn with him for his friend. This tablet is remarkable for the number of cities mentioned as already existing in the time of Izdubar. Combining this notice with other early inscriptions, the statements of Berosus and the notice of the cities of Nimrod in Genesis, we get the following list of the oldest known cities in the Euphrates valley:—

1. Babylon and its suburb
2. Borsippa.
3. Cutha.
4. Larsa.
5. Surippak, called Larancha by Berosus.

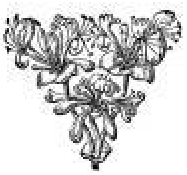
6. Eridu.
7. Nipur.
8. Erech.
9. Calneh.
10. Sippara. (Sepharvaim.)
11. Kisu (or Kis).
12. Ganganna.
13. Amarda or Marad.
14. Ur
15. Nisin or Karrak.
16. Agané.
17. Duban or Duran.
18. Abnunna or Mullias.
19. Zirghul.

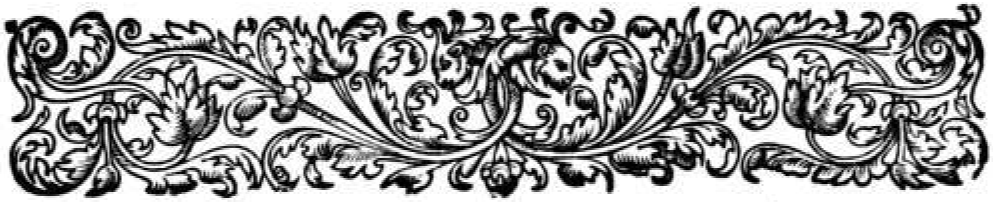
To these we may also add the great cities of Assyria:—

20. Assur, the primitive capital.
21. Ninua or Nineveh.
22. Calah.
23. Resen (Assyrian Res-eni, “the head of the spring.”)

So far as the various statements go, all these cities and probably many others were in existence in the time of Nimrod, and some of them even before the Flood; the fact that the Babylonians four thousand years ago believed their cities to be of such antiquity, shows that they were not recent foundations, and the attainments of the people at that time in the arts and sciences prove that their civilization had already known ages of progress. The legendary epoch of Izdubar must be considered at present as the commencement of the united monarchy in Babylonia, and as marking the first of the series of great conquests in Western Asia; but how far back we have to go from our earliest known monuments to reach this era we cannot now tell.

Every nation has its hero, and it was only natural that when the Accadian kings of Ur at last succeeded in establishing an united empire throughout Babylonia, the legends of the national hero should be coloured by the new conception of imperial unity.





CHAPTER XVII.
CONCLUSION.

Notices of Genesis.—Correspondence of names.—Abram.—Ur of Chaldees.—Ishmael.—Sargon of Agané.—His birth.—Concealed in ark.—Creation.—Garden of Eden.—Oannes.—Berosus.—Izdubar legends.—Babylonian seals.—Egyptian names.—Assyrian sculptures.

SCATTERED through various cuneiform inscriptions are other notices, names, or passages, connected with the Book of Genesis. Although the names of the Genesis patriarchs are not in the inscriptions which give the history of the mythical period, nevertheless some of the patriarchal names of Genesis are found here and there in the inscriptions.

The name Adam is in the Creation legends, but only in a general sense as man, as in Gen. i. 26, 27, 28.; v. 1, not as a proper name. Several of the other names of antediluvian patriarchs correspond with Babylonian words and roots, such as Methusael (Gen. iv. 18), which is the Assyrian mutu-sa-ili, "man of God," and has been changed into Methuselah (Gen. v. 21) in order to assimilate it to the genius of the Hebrew language, or Noah, the Assyrian nukhu, "rest;" but, besides these, certain names appear as proper names also in Babylonia, among them Cainan, Lamech, and Laban.

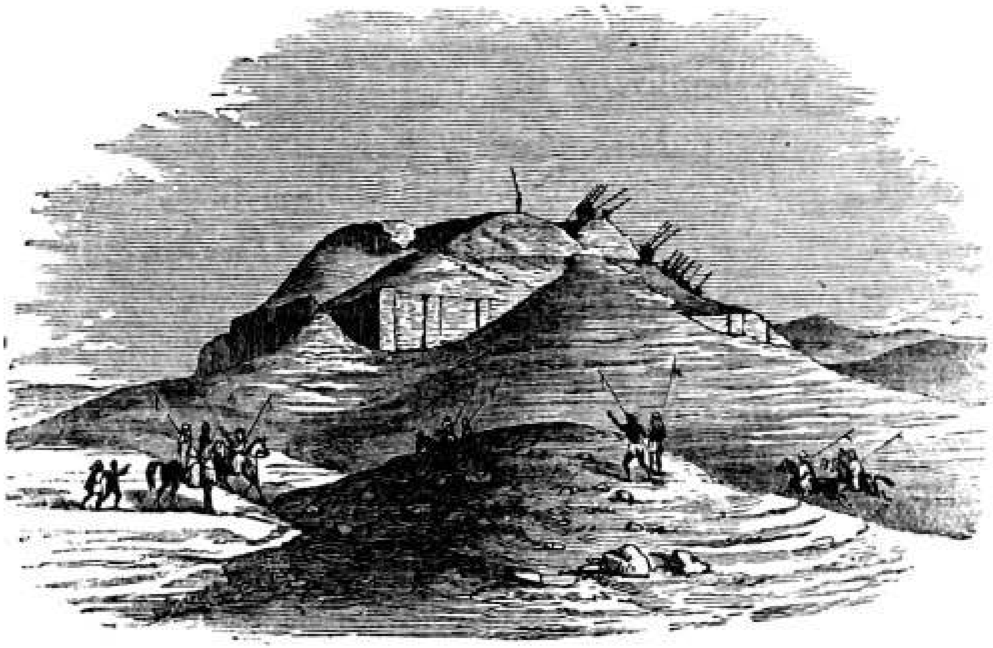
Cainan is found as the name of a Babylonian town Kan-nan; the inhabitants of which were sometimes called Kanunai, which must not be confounded with the name of the Canaanites or "lowlanders," originally the inhabitants of the coastland of Phœnicia and then, by extension, of all Palestine.

Lamech has already been pointed out by Palmer ("Egyptian Chronicles," vol. i. p. 56), in the name of the deified Phœnician patriarch Diamich; this name is found in the cuneiform texts as Dumugu and Lamga, two forms of the Accadian name of the moon.

The two wives of Lamech, Adah and Zillah, seem to be the Assyrian edhutu or edhatu "darkness," and tsillatu "the shades of night;" and the names of his two sons Jabal and Jubal are but varying forms of the Assyrian abil "son." Dr. Oppert long ago pointed out that this Assyrian word was the origin of the name Abel which has been assimilated in spelling to a Hebrew word signifying "mere breath."

Some of the names of the patriarchs after the Flood are found as names of towns in Syria, but not in Babylonia; among these are Reu or Ragu, Serug, and Harran.

Laban, on the other hand, as was first noticed by Dr. Delitzsch, is mentioned in a list of gods given in a cuneiform tablet (published in the "Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia," iii. 66, 6.)



MUGHEIR, THE SITE OF UR OF THE CHALDEES.

The name of Abramu or Abram is found in the Assyrian inscriptions in the time of Esarhaddon. After the captivity of the ten tribes, some of the Israelites prospered in Assyria, and rose to positions of trust in the empire. Abram was one of these, he was sukulu rabu or "great attendant" of Esarhaddon, and was eponym in Assyria, B.C. 677. Various other Hebrew names are found in Assyria about this time, including Pekah, Hoshea, and several compounded with the two Divine names Elohim and Jehovah, showing that both these names were in use among the Israelites. The presence of proper names founded on the Genesis stories, like Abram, and the use at this time of these forms of the Divine name, should be taken into consideration in discussing the evidence of the antiquity of Genesis.

Ur, now represented by the mounds of Mugheir, on the western bank of the Euphrates to the south of Babylon, was the capital of the earliest Accadian dynasty with which we are acquainted. It was specially devoted to the worship of the moon-god, the ruins of whose temple have been discovered there. Ur was the birthplace of Abraham, in whom we must see one of those Semitic intruders who settled among the Accadians, and after adopting their culture and civilization finally succeeded in overcoming and supplanting them. It is probable that it is called Ur Casdim, "Ur of the Casdim," in Genesis only proleptically, since Casdim appears to be the representative of an Assyrian word meaning "conquerors"—a suitable epithet for the Semitic tribes after their conquest of Babylonia. The Greek names Chaldean and Chaldea are of much later date, being derived from the Kaldai, a small tribe settled on the Persian Gulf and first mentioned in the ninth century B.C., who under Merodach-Baladan (B.C. 721-709) possessed themselves of Babylonia and became so integral a portion of its inhabitants as to give their name to the whole of them in classical times.

Some of the Genesis names are found at a comparatively early date, the first which appears on a contemporary monument being Ishmael. In the reign of Khammuragas among the witnesses to some documents at Larsa in Babylonia, appears a man named "Abuha son of Ishmael."

After the time of Abraham the book of Genesis is concerned with the affairs of Palestine, and of the countries in its immediate vicinity, and it has no connection with Babylonian history and traditions; however, the cuneiform records contain one story which has a striking likeness to that of Moses in the ark, and which, although not within the period covered by Genesis, is of great interest in connection with the early history of the Jews.

Sargina or Sargon I. was a Babylonian monarch who reigned in the city of Agané about B.C. 1800. The name of Sargon signifies the right, true, or legitimate king, and may have been assumed on his ascending the throne. Sargon was probably of obscure origin, and hence the myth that attached itself to him in later popular belief. This curious story is found on fragments of tablets from Kouyunjik, and reads as follows:

1. Sargina the powerful king the king of Agané am I.
2. My mother was a princess, my father I did not know, a brother of my father chose the mountains.
3. In the city of Azupiranu which by the side of the river Euphrates is situated
4. (my) mother the princess conceived me; in an inaccessible place she brought me forth.
5. She placed me in a basket of rushes, with bitumen my exit she sealed up.
6. She launched me on the river which did not drown me.
7. The river carried me, to Akki the irrigator it brought me.
8. Akki the irrigator in tenderness of bowels lifted me up;
9. Akki the irrigator as his child brought me up,
10. Akki the irrigator as his woodman set me,
11. and in my woodmanship Istar loved me.
12. 45? years the kingdom I ruled,
13. the people of the black heads I governed, I ..
14. over rugged countries in many chariots of bronze I rode,
15. I governed the upper countries,
16. I ruled? over the chiefs of the lower countries.
17. To the sea coast three times I advanced, Dilvun (in the Persian Gulf) submitted,
18. Durankigal bowed, &c. &c.

After this follows an address to any king who should at a later time notice the inscription.

This myth is but a repetition of the oft-told story, how the hero of noble birth is born in secret, is exposed to death, but is rescued and brought up in a humble sphere of life until the time comes when his true origin and character are revealed, and he becomes a mighty prince and conqueror. The legend was told of Perseus in Greece, of Romulus in Italy, of Cyrus in Persia. But just as Cyrus was a real personage upon whom the legend was fastened, so too Sargon was a real personage, who founded the great library of Agané, and extended his conquests as far as the island of Cyprus, which he conquered in the third year of his reign.

The most hazardous of the theories put forward in the preceding chapters is the one which identifies Izdubar with Nimrod, and makes him reign in the legendary period of Babylonian history. This theory is founded on several plausible, but probably merely superficial grounds; and if any one accepts Mr. Smith's view on the point, it will be only for similar reasons to those which caused him to propose it; namely, because, failing this, we have no clue whatever to the age and position of the most famous hero in Oriental tradition.

We must never lose sight of the fact that, apart from the more perfect and main parts of these texts, both in the decipherment of the broken fragments and in the various theories projected respecting them, the Assyrian scholar must change his opinions many times, and no doubt any accession of new material would change again our views respecting the parts affected by it. These theories and conclusions, however, although not always correct, have, on their way, assisted the inquiry, and have led to the more accurate knowledge of the texts; for certainly in cuneiform matters we have often had to advance through error to truth.

In adopting Mr. Smith's theory for the position of Nimrod, one thing is certainly clear: he is placed as low in the chronology as it is possible to make him.

The stories and myths given in the foregoing pages have, probably, very different values; some are genuine traditions—some compiled to account for natural phenomena, and some pure romances. At the head of their history and traditions the Babylonians placed an account of the creation of the world; and, although different forms of this story were current, in certain features they all agreed. Beside the account of the present animals, they related the creation of legions of monster forms which disappeared before the human epoch, and they accounted for the great problem of humanity—the presence of evil in the world—by making out that it proceeded from the original chaos, the spirit of confusion and darkness, which was the origin of all things, and which was even older than the gods.

The principal story of the Creation, given in Chapter V., substantially agrees, as far as it is preserved, with the Biblical account. According to it, there was a chaos of watery matter before the Creation, and from this all things were generated.

We have then a considerable blank, the contents of which we can only conjecture, and after this we come to the creation of the heavenly orbs.

The fifth tablet in the series relates how God created the constellations of the stars, the signs of the zodiac, the planets and other stars, the moon and the sun. After another blank we have a fragment which relates to the creation of wild and domestic animals; it is curious here that the original taming of domestic animals was even then so far back in the history of the race that all knowledge of it was lost, and the "animals of the city," or domestic animals, were considered different creations from the "animals of the desert," or "field," or wild animals.

We next come to the war between the dragon and powers of evil, or chaos, on one side and the gods on the other. The gods have weapons forged for them, and Merodach undertakes to lead the heavenly host against the dragon. The war, which is described with spirit, ends of course in the triumph of the principle of good, and the overthrow of primeval anarchy.

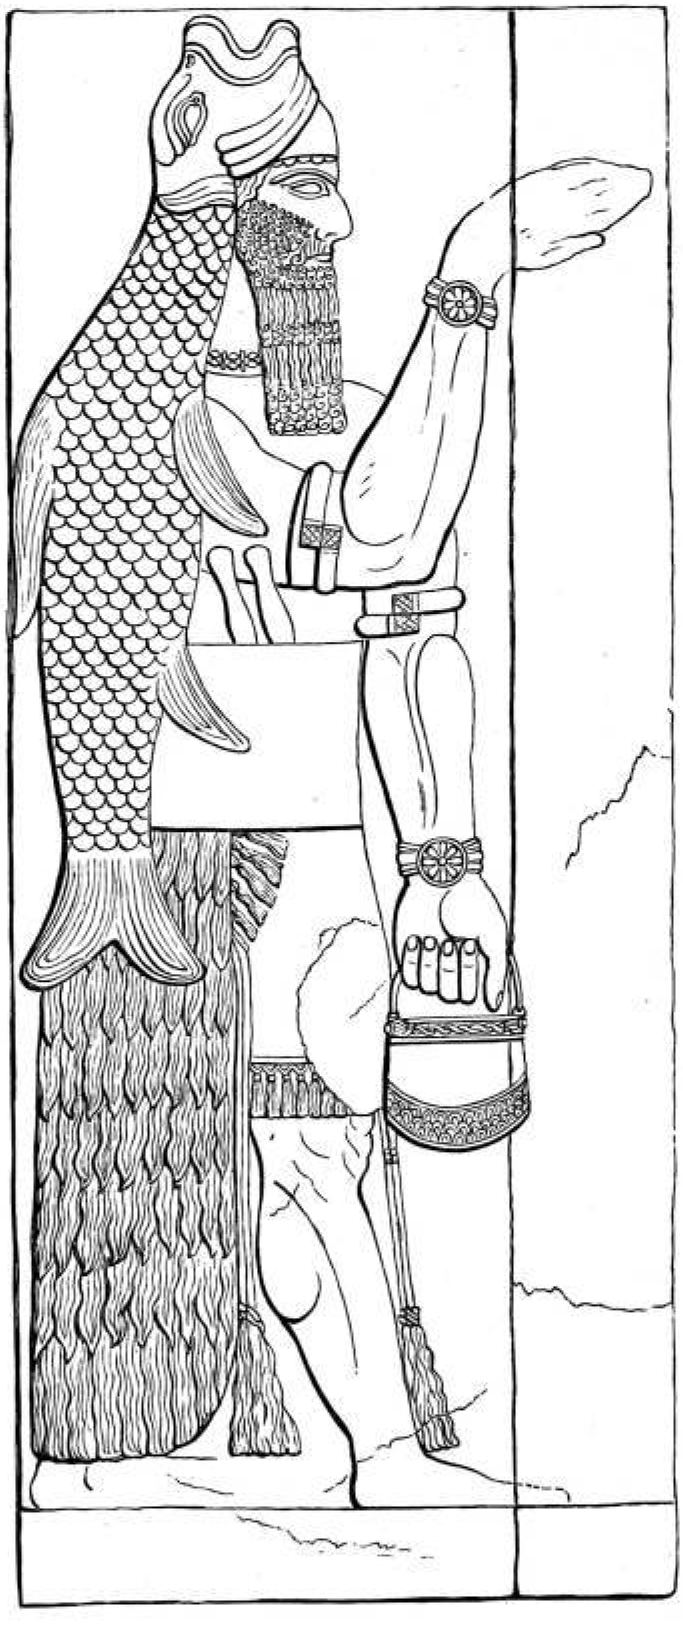
In Chapter V. another account of the Creation is given which differs materially from the first. The principal feature in the second account is the description of the eagle-headed men with their family of leaders—this legend clearly showing the origin of the eagle-headed figures represented on the Assyrian sculptures.

It is probable that some of these Babylonian legends contained detailed descriptions of the Garden of Eden, which seems to have been the district of Eridu in the south of Babylonia, as Sir Henry Rawlinson believes.

There are coincidences in respect to the geography of the region and its name which render the identification very probable; of the four rivers in each case, two, the Euphrates and Tigris, are identical; then, again, the known fertility of the region, its name sometimes Gan-duni, so similar to Gan-eden (the Garden of Eden), and other considerations, all tend towards the view that it is the Paradise of Genesis.

There are evidences of the belief in the tree of life, which is one of the most common emblems on the seals and larger sculptures, and is even used as an ornament on dresses; a sacred tree is also several times mentioned in the legends and hymns, but at present there is no direct connection known between the tree and the Fall, although the gem engravings render it very probable that there was a legend of this kind like the one in Genesis.

In the history of Berosus mention is made of a composite being, half man, half fish, named Oannes, who was supposed to have appeared out of the sea and to have taught the Babylonians all their learning. The Babylonian and Assyrian sculptures have made us familiar with the figure of Oannes, and have so far given evidence that Berosus has truly described this mythological figure; but it is a curious fact that the legend of Oannes, which must have been one of the Babylonian stories of the Creation, has not yet been recovered. In fact, as previously noticed (p. 12), there is only one fragment which can be at all referred to it, and this has been accidentally preserved among a series of extracts from various Accadian works in a bilingual reading-book compiled for the use of Assyrian students of Accadian. The fragment is as follows:—



OANNES. FROM NIMROUD SCULPTURE.

1. To the waters their god
2. has returned:
3. to the house of bright things
4. he descended (as) an icicle:
5. on a seat of snow
6. he grew not old in wisdom.

The legend of Oannes, whose name may possibly be the Accadian Hea-khan, “Hea the fish,” concerned the Babylonians only, and so did not interest the Assyrians, who did not care to have it in their libraries.

Besides the legend of Oannes, however, there are evidently many stories of early times still unknown, or only known by mere fragments or allusions.

The fables given in Chapter IX. form a series quite different in character from the legends, and the only excuse for inserting them here is the need of exhibiting as clearly and fully as possible the literature of the great epoch which produced the Genesis tablets.

Most of the other stories apparently relate to the great period before the Flood, when celestial visitors came to and from the earth, and the inhabitants of the world were very distinctly divided into the good and bad, but the stories are only fables with a moral attached, and have little connection with Babylonian history.

Two of these stories are very curious, and may hereafter turn out to be of great importance; one is the story of the sin committed by the god Zu, and the other the story of Atarpi.

Berosus in his history has given an account of ten Chaldean kings who reigned before the Flood, and the close of this period is well known from the descriptions of the Deluge in the Bible, the Deluge tablet, and the work of the Greek writer. According to Berosus several of the Babylonian cities were built before the Flood, and various arts were known, including writing. The enormous reigns given by Berosus to his ten kings, making a total of 432,000 years, force us to discard the idea that the details are historical, although there may be some foundation for his statement of a civilization before the Deluge. The details given in the inscriptions describing the Flood leave no doubt that both the Bible and the Babylonian story describe the same event, and the Flood becomes the starting-point for the modern world in both histories. According to Berosus 86 kings reigned for 34,080 years after the Flood down to the Median conquest. If these kings are historical, it is doubtful if they formed a continuous line, and they could scarcely cover a longer period than 2,000 years. The Median or Elamite conquest took place about B.C. 2700, and, if we allow the round number 2,000 years for the previous period, it will make the Flood fall about B.C. 4700. In a fragmentary inscription with a list of Babylonian kings, some names are given which appear to belong to the 86 kings of Berosus, but our information about this period is so scanty that nothing can be said about this dynasty, and a suggestion as to the date of the Deluge must be received with more than the usual grain of salt.

We can see, however, that there was a civilized race in Babylonia before the Median Conquest, the progress of which must have received a rude shock when the country was overrun by the uncivilized Eastern borderers.

Among the fragmentary notices of this semi-mythical period is the portion of the inscription describing the building of the Tower of Babel and the dispersion.

It is probable from the fragments of Berosus that the incursions and dominion of the Median Elamites lasted about two hundred years, during which the country suffered greatly from them.

The legends of Izdubar or Nimrod commence with a description of the evils brought upon Babylonia by foreign invasion, the conquest and sacking of the city of Erech being one of the incidents in the story. Izdubar, a famous hunter, who claimed descent from a long line of kings, reaching up to the time of the Flood, now comes forward; he has a dream, and after much trouble a half-human creature named Hea-bani is persuaded by Zaidu, the hunter, and two females, to come to Erech and interpret the dream of Izdubar. Hea-bani, having heard the fame of Izdubar, brings to Erech a midannu or tiger to test his strength, and Izdubar slays it. After these things, Izdubar and Hea-bani become friends, and, having invoked the gods, they start to attack the tyrant Khumbaba. Khumbaba dwelt in a thick forest, surrounded by a wall, and here he was visited by the two friends, who slew him and carried off his spoils.

Izdubar was now proclaimed king, and extended his authority over the Babylonian world, his court and palace being at Erech. The goddess Istar, daughter of Anu according to one myth, of Bel according to another, of Sin, the moon god, according to a third, who had loved the shepherd Tammuz, the Sun-god, fell in love with Izdubar. He refused her offers, and the goddess, angry at his answer, ascended to heaven and petitioned her father Anu to create a bull for her, to be an instrument of her vengeance. Anu complied, and created the bull, on which Izdubar and Hea-bani collected a band of warriors and went against it. Hea-bani took hold of the animal by its head and tail, while Izdubar slew it.

Istar on this cursed Izdubar, and descended to Hades to attempt once more to summon unearthly powers against the hero. She descends to the infernal regions, which are vividly described, and, passing through their seven gates, is ushered into the presence of the queen of the dead. The world of love goes wrong in the absence of Istar, and on the petition of the gods she is once more brought to the earth, ultimately Anatu, her mother, satisfying her vengeance by striking Izdubar with a loathsome disease.

Hea-bani, the friend of Izdubar, is now killed, and Izdubar, mourning his double affliction, abandons his kingdom and wanders into the desert to seek the advice of Xisuthrus his ancestor, who had been translated for his piety and now dwelt with the gods.

Izdubar now had a dream, and after this wandered to the region where gigantic composite monsters held and controlled the rising and setting sun: from these he learned the road to the region of the blessed, and, passing across a great waste of sand, arrived at a region where splendid trees were laden with jewels instead of fruit.

Izdubar then met two females, named Siduri and Sabitu, after an adventure with whom he found a boatman named Nes-Hea, who undertook to navigate him to the region where Xisuthrus dwelt.

Coming near the dwelling of the blessed, he found it surrounded by the waters of death, which he had to cross in order to reach the land of which he was in search.

On arriving at the other side, Izdubar was met by Mu-seri-ina-namari, “the waters of dawn at daybreak,” who engaged him in conversation about Hea-bani, and then Xisuthrus, taking up the conversation, described to him the Deluge. Izdubar was afterwards cured of his illness and returned with Nes-Hea to Erech, where he mourned anew for his friend Hea-bani, and on intercession with the gods the ghost of Hea-bani arose from the ground where the body had lain.

The details of this story, and especially the accounts of the regions inhabited by the dead, are very striking, and illustrate, in a wonderful manner, the religious views of the people.

It is worth while here to pause, and consider the evidence of the existence of the legends recounted in the preceding pages from the close of the mythical period down to the seventh century B.C.

We have first the seals: of these there are some hundreds in European museums, and among the earliest are many specimens carved with scenes from the Genesis legends; some of these are a good deal older than B.C. 2000, others may be ranged at various dates down to B.C. 1500.

With three exceptions, which are of Assyrian origin, all the seals engraved in the present volume are Babylonian. One very fine and early example is photographed as the frontispiece of the book. The character and style of the cuneiform legend which accompanies this shows it to be one of the most ancient specimens; it is engraved on a hard jasper cylinder in bold style, and is a remarkable example of early Babylonian art. Many other similar cylinders of the same period are known; the relief on them is bolder than on the later seals, on which from about B.C. 1600 or 1700, a change in the inscriptions becomes general.

The numerous illustrations to the present work, which have been collected from these early Babylonian seals, will serve to show that the legends were well known, and formed part of the literature of the country before the second millennium B.C.

After B.C. 1500, the literature of Babylonia is unknown, and we lose sight of all evidence of its legends for some centuries. In the meantime Egypt supplies a few notices bearing on the subject, which serve to show that knowledge of them was still kept up. Nearly thirteen hundred years before the Christian era one of the Egyptian poems likens a hero to the Assyrian chief, Kazartu, a great hunter. Kazartu probably means a “strong” or “powerful” one, and it has already been suggested that the reference is to the hero Nimrod. A little later, in the period extending from B.C. 1000 to 800, we have in Egypt several persons named Namurot, which seems to be an echo of the name of the mighty hunter.

On the revival of the Assyrian empire, about B.C. 990, we come again to numerous references to the Genesis legends, and these continue through almost every reign down to the close of the empire. The Assyrians carved the sacred tree and cherubim on their walls, they depicted in the temples the struggle between Merodach and the dragon, they decorated their portals with the figure of Izdubar strangling a lion, and carved the struggles of Izdubar and Hea-bani with the lion and the bull even on their stone vases.

Just as the sculptures of the Greek temples, the paintings on the vases and the carving on their gems were taken from their myths and legends, so the series of myths and legends belonging to the valley of the Euphrates furnished materials for the sculptor, the engraver, and the painter, among the ancient Babylonians and Assyrians.

In this way we have continued evidence of the existence of these legends down to the time of Assur-bani-pal, B.C. 673 to 626, who caused the present known copies to be made for his library at Nineveh.

Search in Babylonia would, no doubt, yield much earlier copies of all these works, but that search has not yet been instituted, and for the present we have to be contented with our Assyrian copies. Looking, however, at the world-wide interest of the subjects, and at the important evidence which perfect copies of these works would undoubtedly give, there can be no doubt that further progress will be made in research and discovery, and that all that is here written will one day be superseded by newer texts and fuller and more perfect light.

A NEW EDITION NOW READY OF Assyrian Discoveries.

An Account of Explorations and Discoveries on the Site of Nineveh during 1873 and 1874.

By GEORGE SMITH,

Late of the Department of Oriental Antiquities, British Museum.

With Maps, Wood-Cuts, and Photographs. One Vol. 8vo. Cloth, $4.00.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

From the N. Y. Daily Tribune.

“Mr. Smith appears to have engaged in his work with equal ardor, perseverance, and good judgment. His habits as a scholar have not impaired his efficiency as a practical man. The recital of his experience is marked by frankness, modesty, and great intelligence.”

From the St. Louis Democrat.

“The book reveals much of the hitherto hidden history of the Assyrian empire, and shows that its people were wise in many things. The maxims translated from the records, and the curious devices and pictures brought to the earth’s surface, give us a clearer knowledge of the character of the people that inhabited that nation than we have gained from any other source. * * * It is a work of great importance, and will be welcomed by all scholars and antiquaries.”

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

“Mr. Smith’s book is, in clearness and accuracy, all that could be wished; himself a great authority on Assyrian antiquities, he has prepared a work which no person who has studied, or intends to study, this fascinating subject should fail to read.”

From the Cincinnati Commercial.

“It is in the hope that these rich, first fruits of investigation will stimulate inquiry, and induce the British Government to take hold of the matter, and bring its influence to bear in such a manner upon the Ottoman Government as to secure its co-operation in prosecuting a thorough system of investigation, that we close Mr. Smith’s absorbingly interesting book.”

From the Watchman and Reflector.

“His book is a simple, straightforward record of what he accomplished, written not to catch the applause of the ignorant, but to inform the wise and the thoughtful. The narrative of personal experience is interesting, without trace of straining for sensational effect. But the chief value of the work is for its account of things accomplished.”

The Origin and Growth of Religion, as Illustrated by

THE RELIGION OF ANCIENT EGYPT.

By P. LE PAGE RENOUF.
(The Hibbert Lectures for 1879.)

One volume, 12mo, $1.50

M. Le Page Renouf's great reputation as an Egyptologist led to his selection to deliver the second course of the already celebrated Hibbert series. His lectures are the fit companions of Professor Müller's, both in learning and in interest. The glimpses laboriously gained by the aid of long undeciphered hieroglyphics into one of the most mystical and profound of all the ancient beliefs, have always had a special fascination; and the time has now come when it is possible to join their results into a fairly complete picture. Done as this is by M. Renouf, with a certain French vividness and clearness, it has a very unusual, and, indeed, unique interest.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

"The narrative is so well put together, the chain of reasoning and inference so obvious, and the illustration so apt, that the general reader can go through it with unabated interest."—Hartford Post.

"No one can rise from reading this book, in which, by the way, the author is careful about drawing his conclusions, without having increased respect for the religion of ancient Egypt, and hardly less than admiration for its ethical system."—The Churchman.

"These lectures are invaluable to students of Egyptology, and as the religion of ancient Egypt stands alone and unconnected with other religions, except those which have been modified by it, itself being apparently original and underived, they should be highly interesting to all students of religious history.... It is impossible in a brief notice to convey an adequate idea of Professor Renouf's admirable lectures."—N. Y. World.

"The present work forms a remarkably intelligent and acutely critical contribution to the history of the origin and growth of religion, as illustrated by the religion of ancient Egypt. As a specialist, Professor Renouf is able to bring forth much information not ordinarily accessible to the general reader, and this he does in such a carefully digested form as to make the work entertaining and instructive in the highest degree."—Boston Courier.

NEW, REVISED, AND ENLARGED EDITION OF DR. SCHLIEMANN'S GREAT WORK.

DISCOVERIES AND RESEARCHES on the sites of ANCIENT MYCENÆ AND TIRYNS.

By DR. HENRY SCHLIEMANN, Author of "Troy and its Remains."

With Preface by the Hon. W. E. Gladstone.

With Maps, Colored Plates, Views and Cuts, representing several Hundred Objects of Antiquity discovered on the Sites.

[IN ALL, FIVE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.]

CRITICAL NOTICES.

“In this magnificent volume we have finally the story of Dr. Schliemann’s last and most important discoveries. He has been the most fortunate of archæological explorers; for even a greater luck than rewarded him in the Troad has fallen to his portion in Argolis. * * * We suspect that the final verdict of scholars will that Dr. Schliemann has actually discovered the remains of the man, some part of whose history, at least, is preserved in the Agamemnon of Homer and Æschylus.”—The N. Y. Tribune.

“Dr. Schliemann’s book is worth all the prolegomens and commentaries upon Homer that have been written since the revival of learning.”—The Boston Globe.

“The interest of the work is not confined to either England or America. Every enlightened nation will welcome it, for it opens up a new world to the modern generation. No work of the time has attracted wider attention.”—Boston Post.

“This splendid volume is a museum of itself which every lover of history and classical literature will feel that he must possess, and which any intelligent reader is competent to understand and enjoy by means of its abundant and truly splendid illustrations.”—Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

“Dr. Schliemann has made the most important contribution of the present century to Greek archæology.”—The Nation.

“We commend the volume, with its admirable typography and multitudinous illustrations, to the attention of our readers, assuring them that they will find it possessed of a rare and enduring interest.”—Boston Journal.

“We add our testimony in saying that a copy of Mycenæ is necessary to the library of every scholar, and—which is no mean praise—that the printing and illustrations of this work are worthy of the matter.”—Baltimore Gazette.

The Conflict of Christianity
WITH HEATHENISM.

By DR. GERHARD UHLHORN.

TRANSLATED BY

PROF. EGBERT C. SMYTH and REV. C. J. H. ROPES.

One Volume, Crown 8vo, $2.50.

This volume describes with extraordinary vividness and spirit the religious and moral condition of the Pagan world, the rise and spread of Christianity, its conflict with heathenism, and its final victory. There is no work that portrays the heroic age of the ancient church with equal spirit, elegance, and incisive power. The author has made thorough and independent study both of the early Christian literature and also of the contemporary records of classic heathenism.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

“It is easy to see why this volume is so highly esteemed. It is systematic, thorough, and concise. But its power is in the wide mental vision and well-balanced imagination of the author, which enable him to reconstruct the scenes of ancient history. An exceptional clearness and force mark his style.”—Boston Advertiser.

“One might read many books without obtaining more than a fraction of the profitable information here conveyed; and he might search a long time before finding one which would so thoroughly fix his attention and command his interest.”—Phil. S. S. Times.

“The work is marked for its broad humanitarian views, its learning, and the wide discretion in selecting from the great field the points of deepest interest.”—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

FOOTNOTES

[1] The native account of the Deluge shows that this name must be corrected to Opartes, the native name being Ubara-Tutu.

[2] A common title of the early Accadian kings is “shepherd,” pointing to the fact that the Accadians had led a pastoral life before their settlement and organization in the Babylonian plain.

[3] Assyrian, Tiamtu, “the deep.”

[4] Assyrian, Apsu, “the ocean.”

[5] Assyrian, Mummu, “chaos.”

[6] Assyrian, Lakhmu or Lakhvu; and Lakhama or Lakhva.

[7] Though Lakhmu properly represented Anu or Anatu, he sometimes takes the place of the Solar hero Ninip as husband of Gula, “the great” goddess.

[8] The seven “sheep (or oxen) of the hero” Tammuz (Orion), of which the first was “the plough-handle,” perhaps Benelnash. One of the others was “the shepherd of the heavenly flock” or Arcturus.

[9] This is Dr. Oppert’s rendering of a line which is so mutilated as to make any attempt at translation extremely doubtful.

[10] The word used here is Accadian (ba-an-an-me).

[11] Since, however, a bilingual tablet states that the pronunciation of the Accadian word for “the desert” which lay on the west side of the Euphrates (where Ur was built) was edinna, it is possible that “the Garden of Eden” of Genesis may be the cultivated portion of edinna, “the desert,” in the neighbourhood of Eridu.

[12] The seven mustakridhât of Syria, the seven days between February the 25th and March 3rd, when evil spirits are supposed to have special power.

[13] This is the Assyrian translation. The Accadian original has simply “men of death.” The lightnings are still regarded as serpents by the Canadian Indians who call the thunder their hissing (Baring-Gould, “Curious Myths,” ii. p. 146).

[14] A constellation which rose heliacally in Marchesvan or October. The word means “Dog of death.”

[15] Compare Jer. li. 34.

[16] This is the reading of the original Accadian text. The Assyrian translation has, “was his establisher.”

[17] Itak had his worshippers as well as Dibbara. Thus an Accadian seal in the possession of Dr. Huggins bears a legend stating that it belonged to “Ruru-lukh, the servant of Itak, the street-traverser.” The god is represented on this seal as a man in a flounced dress, to whom a kid is being offered, and is symbolized by two animals one of which looks like a locust, the other like a monkey.

18 Another copy of the legend reads “lover.”

19 Literally, “a thing hung up.”

20 Or “bull of heaven.” It was a constellation, perhaps Taurus.

21 “Joy” and “Seduction.”

22 A great necropolis seems to have existed in Cutha.

23 Literally “precious stones.”

24 That is, “Go forth, cause it to be light!”

25 Literally “the man who is a female dog,” or “lion.”

26 Literally “stone stakes” or “cones,” the symbols of the goddess Ashêrah. Cf. 1 Kings vii. 15-22.

27 Tillili, the Accadian name of Kharimat, is here used. Tillili was the wife of the Sun-god Alala symbolized by the eagle, which we are told was “the symbol of the southern” or “meridian sun.” What Sir H. Rawlinson calls the monotheistic party among the Babylonians resolved Tillili into Anatu and Alala into Anu.

28 This last sentence is found only in the fragment discovered by Mr. Rassam.

29 Or: He then intelligently.

30 The fragment brought to England by Mr. Rassam reads 6.

31 The word used here is ziggurrat, which is employed to denote the towers attached to Babylonian temples. These towers were commonly used as observatories.

32 Bricks have been found at Warka or Erech bearing the name of a certain king Sin-kudur, who calls himself the son of this same goddess, and describes himself as the builder of the temple of Anu at Erech.

Updated editions will replace the previous one--the old editions will be renamed.

Creating the works from print editions not protected by U.S. copyright law means that no one owns a United States copyright in these works, so the Foundation (and you!) can copy and distribute it in the United States without permission and without paying copyright royalties. Special rules, set forth in the General Terms of Use part of this license, apply to copying and distributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works to protect the PROJECT GUTENBERG-tm concept and trademark. Project Gutenberg is a registered trademark, and may not be used if you charge for the eBooks, unless you receive specific permission. If you do not charge anything for copies of this eBook, complying with the rules is very easy. You may use this eBook for nearly any purpose such as creation of derivative works, reports, performances and research. They may be modified and printed and given away--you may do practically ANYTHING in the United States with eBooks not protected by U.S. copyright law. Redistribution is subject to the trademark license, especially commercial redistribution.

START: FULL LICENSE

THE FULL PROJECT GUTENBERG LICENSE
PLEASE READ THIS BEFORE YOU DISTRIBUTE OR USE THIS WORK

To protect the Project Gutenberg-tm mission of promoting the free distribution of electronic works, by using or distributing this work (or any other work associated in any way with the phrase "Project Gutenberg"), you agree to comply with all the terms of the Full Project Gutenberg-tm License available with this file or online at www.gutenberg.org/license.

Section 1. General Terms of Use and Redistributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works

1.A. By reading or using any part of this Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work, you indicate that you have read, understand, agree to and accept all the terms of this license and intellectual property (trademark/copyright) agreement. If you do not agree to abide by all the terms of this agreement, you must cease using and return or destroy all copies of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works in your possession. If you paid a fee for obtaining a copy of or access to a Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work and you do not agree to be bound by the terms of this agreement, you may obtain a refund from the person or entity to whom you paid the fee as set forth in paragraph 1.E.8.

1.B. "Project Gutenberg" is a registered trademark. It may only be used on or associated in any way with an electronic work by people who agree to be bound by the terms of this agreement. There are a few things that you can do with most Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works even without complying with the full terms of this agreement. See paragraph 1.C below. There are a lot of things you can do with Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works if you follow the terms of this agreement and help preserve free future access to Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works. See paragraph 1.E below.

1.C. The Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation ("the Foundation" or PGLAF), owns a compilation copyright in the collection of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works. Nearly all the individual works in the collection are in the public domain in the United States. If an individual work is unprotected by copyright law in the United States and you are located in the United States, we do not claim a right to prevent you from copying, distributing, performing, displaying or creating derivative works based on the work as long as all references to Project Gutenberg are removed. Of course, we hope that you will support the Project Gutenberg-tm mission of promoting free access to electronic works by freely sharing Project Gutenberg-tm works in compliance with the terms of this agreement for keeping the Project Gutenberg-tm name associated with the work. You can easily comply with the terms of this agreement by keeping this work in the same format with its attached full Project Gutenberg-tm License when you share it without charge with others.

1.D. The copyright laws of the place where you are located also govern what you can do with this work. Copyright laws in most countries are in a constant state of change. If you are outside the United States, check the laws of your country in addition to the terms of this agreement before downloading, copying, displaying, performing, distributing or creating derivative works based on this work or any other Project Gutenberg-tm work. The Foundation makes no representations concerning the copyright status of any work in any country outside the United States.

1.E. Unless you have removed all references to Project Gutenberg:

1.E.1. The following sentence, with active links to, or other immediate access to, the full Project Gutenberg-tm License must appear prominently whenever any copy of a Project Gutenberg-tm work (any work on which the phrase "Project Gutenberg" appears, or with which the phrase "Project Gutenberg" is associated) is accessed, displayed, performed, viewed, copied or distributed:

> This eBook is for the use of anyone anywhere in the United States and most other parts of the world at no cost and with almost no restrictions whatsoever. You may copy it, give it away or re-use it under the terms of the Project Gutenberg License included with this eBook or online at www.gutenberg.org. If you are not located in the United States, you'll have to check the laws of the country where you are located before using this ebook.

1.E.2. If an individual Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work is derived from texts not protected by U.S. copyright law (does not contain a notice indicating that it is posted with permission of the copyright holder), the work can be copied and distributed to anyone in the United States without paying any fees or charges. If you are redistributing or providing access to a work with the phrase "Project Gutenberg" associated with or appearing on the work, you must comply either with the requirements of paragraphs 1.E.1 through 1.E.7 or obtain permission for the use of the work and the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark as set forth in paragraphs 1.E.8 or 1.E.9.

1.E.3. If an individual Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work is posted with the permission of the copyright holder, your use and distribution must comply with both paragraphs 1.E.1 through 1.E.7 and any additional terms imposed by the copyright holder. Additional terms will be linked to the Project Gutenberg-tm License for all works posted with the permission of the copyright holder found at the beginning of this work.

1.E.4. Do not unlink or detach or remove the full Project Gutenberg-tm License terms from this work, or any files containing a part of this work or any other work associated with Project Gutenberg-tm.

1.E.5. Do not copy, display, perform, distribute or redistribute this electronic work, or any part of this electronic work, without prominently displaying the sentence set forth in paragraph 1.E.1 with active links or immediate access to the full terms of the Project Gutenberg-tm License.

1.E.6. You may convert to and distribute this work in any binary, compressed, marked up, nonproprietary or proprietary form, including any word processing or hypertext form. However, if you provide access to or distribute copies of a Project Gutenberg-tm work in a format other than "Plain Vanilla ASCII" or other format used in the official version posted on the official Project Gutenberg-tm web site (www.gutenberg.org), you must, at no additional cost, fee or expense to the user, provide a copy, a means of exporting a copy, or a means of obtaining a copy upon request, of the work in its original "Plain Vanilla ASCII" or other form. Any alternate format must include the full Project Gutenberg-tm License as specified in paragraph 1.E.1.

1.E.7. Do not charge a fee for access to, viewing, displaying, performing, copying or distributing any Project Gutenberg-tm works unless you comply with paragraph 1.E.8 or 1.E.9.

1.E.8. You may charge a reasonable fee for copies of or providing access to or distributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works provided that

* You pay a royalty fee of 20% of the gross profits you derive from the use of Project Gutenberg-tm works calculated using the method you already use to calculate your applicable taxes. The fee is owed to the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark, but he has agreed to donate royalties under this paragraph to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation. Royalty payments must be paid within 60 days following each date on which you prepare (or are legally required to prepare) your periodic tax returns. Royalty payments should be clearly marked as such and sent to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation at the address specified in Section 4, "Information about donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation."

* You provide a full refund of any money paid by a user who notifies you in writing (or by e-mail) within 30 days of receipt that s/he does not agree to the terms of the full Project Gutenberg-tm License. You must require such a user to return or destroy all copies of the works possessed in a physical medium and discontinue all use of and all access to other copies of Project Gutenberg-tm works.

* You provide, in accordance with paragraph 1.F.3, a full refund of any money paid for a work or a replacement copy, if a defect in the electronic work is discovered and reported to you within 90 days of receipt of the work.

* You comply with all other terms of this agreement for free distribution of Project Gutenberg-tm works.

1.E.9. If you wish to charge a fee or distribute a Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work or group of works on different terms than are set forth in this agreement, you must obtain permission in writing from both the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation and The Project Gutenberg Trademark LLC, the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark. Contact the Foundation as set forth in Section 3 below.

1.F.

1.F.1. Project Gutenberg volunteers and employees expend considerable effort to identify, do copyright research on, transcribe and proofread works not protected by U.S. copyright law in creating the Project Gutenberg-tm collection. Despite these efforts, Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works, and the medium on which they may be stored, may contain "Defects," such as, but not limited to, incomplete, inaccurate or corrupt data, transcription errors, a copyright or other intellectual property infringement, a defective or damaged disk or other medium, a computer virus, or computer codes that damage or cannot be read by your equipment.

1.F.2. LIMITED WARRANTY, DISCLAIMER OF DAMAGES - Except for the "Right of Replacement or Refund" described in paragraph 1.F.3, the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation, the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark, and any other party distributing a Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work under this agreement, disclaim all liability to you for damages, costs and expenses, including legal fees. YOU AGREE THAT YOU HAVE NO REMEDIES FOR NEGLIGENCE, STRICT LIABILITY, BREACH OF WARRANTY OR BREACH OF CONTRACT EXCEPT THOSE PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH 1.F.3. YOU AGREE THAT THE FOUNDATION, THE TRADEMARK OWNER, AND ANY DISTRIBUTOR UNDER THIS AGREEMENT WILL NOT BE LIABLE TO YOU FOR ACTUAL, DIRECT, INDIRECT, CONSEQUENTIAL, PUNITIVE OR INCIDENTAL DAMAGES EVEN IF YOU GIVE NOTICE OF THE POSSIBILITY OF SUCH DAMAGE.

1.F.3. LIMITED RIGHT OF REPLACEMENT OR REFUND - If you discover a defect in this electronic work within 90 days of receiving it, you can receive a refund of the money (if any) you paid for it by sending a written explanation to the person you received the work from. If you received the work on a physical medium, you must return the medium with your written explanation. The person or entity that provided you with the defective work may elect to provide a replacement copy in lieu of a refund. If you received the work electronically, the person or entity providing it to you may choose to give you a second opportunity to receive the work electronically in lieu of a refund. If the second copy is also defective, you may demand a refund in writing without further opportunities to fix the problem.

1.F.4. Except for the limited right of replacement or refund set forth in paragraph 1.F.3, this work is provided to you 'AS-IS', WITH NO OTHER WARRANTIES OF ANY KIND, EXPRESS OR IMPLIED, INCLUDING BUT NOT LIMITED TO WARRANTIES OF MERCHANTABILITY OR FITNESS FOR ANY PURPOSE.

1.F.5. Some states do not allow disclaimers of certain implied warranties or the exclusion or limitation of certain types of damages. If any disclaimer or limitation set forth in this agreement violates the law of the state applicable to this agreement, the agreement shall be interpreted to make the maximum disclaimer or limitation permitted by the applicable state law. The invalidity or unenforceability of any provision of this agreement shall not void the remaining provisions.

1.F.6. INDEMNITY - You agree to indemnify and hold the Foundation, the trademark owner, any agent or employee of the Foundation, anyone providing copies of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works in accordance with this agreement, and any volunteers associated with the production, promotion and distribution of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works, harmless from all liability, costs and expenses, including legal fees, that arise directly or indirectly from any of the following which you do or cause to occur: (a) distribution of this or any Project Gutenberg-tm work, (b) alteration, modification, or additions or deletions to any Project Gutenberg-tm work, and (c) any Defect you cause.

Section 2. Information about the Mission of Project Gutenberg-tm

Project Gutenberg-tm is synonymous with the free distribution of electronic works in formats readable by the widest variety of computers including obsolete, old, middle-aged and new computers. It exists because of the efforts of hundreds of volunteers and donations from people in all walks of life.

Volunteers and financial support to provide volunteers with the assistance they need are critical to reaching Project Gutenberg-tm's goals and ensuring that the Project Gutenberg-tm collection will remain freely available for generations to come. In 2001, the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation was created to provide a secure and permanent future for Project Gutenberg-tm and future generations. To learn more about the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation and how your efforts and donations can help, see Sections 3 and 4 and the Foundation information page at www.gutenberg.org

Section 3. Information about the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation

The Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation is a non profit 501(c)(3) educational corporation organized under the laws of the state of Mississippi and granted tax exempt status by the Internal Revenue Service. The Foundation's EIN or federal tax identification number is 64-6221541. Contributions to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation are tax deductible to the full extent permitted by U.S. federal laws and your state's laws.

The Foundation's principal office is in Fairbanks, Alaska, with the mailing address: PO Box 750175, Fairbanks, AK 99775, but its volunteers and employees are scattered throughout numerous locations. Its business office is located at 809 North 1500 West, Salt Lake City, UT 84116, (801) 596-1887. Email contact links and up to date contact information can be found at the Foundation's web site and official page at www.gutenberg.org/contact

For additional contact information:

Chief Executive and Director

Section 4. Information about Donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation

Project Gutenberg-tm depends upon and cannot survive without wide spread public support and donations to carry out its mission of increasing the number of public domain and licensed works that can be freely distributed in machine readable form accessible by the widest array of equipment including outdated equipment. Many small donations ($1 to $5,000) are particularly important to maintaining tax exempt status with the IRS.

The Foundation is committed to complying with the laws regulating charities and charitable donations in all 50 states of the United States. Compliance requirements are not uniform and it takes a considerable effort, much paperwork and many fees to meet and keep up with these requirements. We do not solicit donations in locations where we have not received written confirmation of compliance. To SEND DONATIONS or determine the status of compliance for any particular state visit www.gutenberg.org/donate

While we cannot and do not solicit contributions from states where we have not met the solicitation requirements, we know of no prohibition against accepting unsolicited donations from donors in such states who approach us with offers to donate.

International donations are gratefully accepted, but we cannot make any statements concerning tax treatment of donations received from outside the United States. U.S. laws alone swamp our small staff.

Please check the Project Gutenberg Web pages for current donation methods and addresses. Donations are accepted in a number of other ways including checks, online payments and credit card donations. To donate, please visit: www.gutenberg.org/donate Section 5. General Information About Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works.

Professor Michael S. Hart was the originator of the Project Gutenberg-tm concept of a library of electronic works that could be freely shared with anyone. For forty years, he produced and distributed Project Gutenberg-tm eBooks with only a loose network of volunteer support.

Project Gutenberg-tm eBooks are often created from several printed editions, all of which are confirmed as not protected by copyright in the U.S. unless a copyright notice is included. Thus, we do not necessarily keep eBooks in compliance with any particular paper edition.

Most people start at our Web site which has the main PG search facility: www.gutenberg.org

This Web site includes information about Project Gutenberg-tm, including how to make donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation, how to help produce our new eBooks, and how to subscribe to our email newsletter to hear about new eBooks.

Acknowledgements

This volume was a truly collaborative effort and would not have been possible without contributions from a number of different people. We would like to thank Julian Deahl, formerly of the publisher Brill, who came up with the idea for the project, and Ivo Romein (Brill), who has very patiently seen it through to completion. The editor of Brill's Companion to the Christian Tradition series, Professor Christopher Bellitto (Kean University), has been supportive throughout. Marian Rothstein (Carthage College) translated chapters 9 and 10 from French, while Geraldine Barandiarán-Muñoz acted as Spanish translator for chapters 8, 11, and 13. Andrew Fear translated chapter 2 from Spanish. The two anonymous reviewers offered constructive feedback that helped us to improve the overall framing of the volume and the authors to develop their chapters. Finally, thanks are due to the authors of the individual chapters. We thank them for the patience and hope that they are pleased with the final product of their hard work.

Isidore's Contexts

CHAPTER 1

Introduction

Andrew Fear and Jamie Wood

"It was arguably the most influential book, after the Bible, in the learned world of the Latin West for nearly a thousand years." This claim, made by the editors of a recent English translation of Isidore of Seville's Etymologiae, is not at all implausible and indicates Isidore's enormous intellectual impact across Europe.[1] Indeed, it is difficult to think of someone who has had an equal effect on European thought for an equivalent length of time. There are around 1,000 extant manuscripts of Isidore's Etymologiae, and this is not counting the various excerpts from it which also circulated widely.[2] Nor was the Etymologiae the only work of Isidore which enjoyed a high reputation: other items from his formidable output, such as the Sententiae, Differentiae, Synonyma, and De Natura Rerum, enjoyed a fame which was equally widespread.[3] Despite his influence, Isidore is nevertheless often seen as an unoriginal collector of data, and thus as a transmitter of the classical tradition rather than a contributor to it. While, like Cassiodorus before him, there can be no doubt that Isidore was a vital conduit through which passed much of the learning of the classical past that would otherwise have been lost, part of the purpose of this volume is to demonstrate that focussing solely on this element of his career is to do the bishop an injustice. The chapters in this volume, as well as much recent research, demonstrate that he was a contributor to as well as a preserver of learning.

Isidore was far from a retiring cleric and came from a family that seems to have involved itself heavily in politics.[4] Although active in the Visigothic kingdom of Spain, he was not himself a Goth, but a Hispano-Roman.[5] His family appear to have hailed from Cartagena on the Levantine coast of south-east Spain, but fled from the town in 554 during the Byzantine invasion of the Iberian Peninsula. His father, Severianus, is sometimes asserted to have been the count of Cartagena, but Isidore only says that he was a native of the city (or perhaps of the province of Carthaginiensis). We have no definitive evidence for the date of Isidore's birth. He was consecrated a bishop in 600/601. The minimum age to be so ordained in the Visigothic Church was thirty.[6] This gives us a terminus ante quem of 570 for his birth; we have no firm data to refine this date further. Most commentators have seen the flight of the family as one from Byzantine occupation or perhaps expulsion by the Byzantines. However, Fontaine and Cazier have argued to the contrary that it was a punitive act by the Visigothic authorities to punish Severianus for supporting the Byzantines.[7] Regardless of his father's sympathies, Isidore shows a deep attachment to the Peninsula, as is seen in his Laus Hispaniae, "In praise of Spain," which prefaces the second redaction of his History of the Goths, Sueves and Vandals and which begins in the following manner:

> Of all the lands from the west to the Indies, you, Spain, O sacred and always fortunate mother of princes and peoples, are the most beautiful. Rightly are you now the queen of all provinces, from which not only the west but also the east borrows its shining lights. You are the pride and the ornament of the world, the most illustrious part of the earth, in which the Getic people are gloriously prolific, rejoicing much and flourishing greatly.[8]

It is hardly surprising, therefore, that Isidore has been described as "el primer español."[9]

[5] Roger Collins, Visigothic Spain 409–711 (Oxford: 2004), 154, has suggested that, given that both Leander and Isidore had names more common in the eastern Mediterranean, their family may have an East Roman origin, but this has not been generally accepted.

The young Isidore was brought up by his elder brother, Leander, who was to become the Trinitarian bishop of Seville in the 570s.[10] Leander's appointment was the first in a sequence of ecclesiastical offices to be occupied by the family. Not only did Isidore later succeed Leander, but another brother, Fulgentius, was to become bishop of nearby Ecija, and his sister Florentina was a nun and possibly became an abbess (perhaps of the convent S. Maria de Valle near Ecija). As is explored in the chapter on Leander's influence on Isidore by Purificación Ubric Rabaneda, Leander was highly active in the politics of the realm and was involved in prince Hermenegild's abortive uprising against his father, the Visigothic King Leovigild (r. 568–86) in 579, as well as in Hermenegild's subsequent conversion from Arianism to Trinitarianism in 582. As a result of these activities, Leander was either exiled from Spain to Byzantium or went there as an envoy for Hermenegild. In any case, while in the East he may have petitioned the Eastern emperor to support Hermenegild's uprising and certainly met and befriended the future Pope Gregory the Great (d. 604).[11] Gregory was later to dedicate his Moralia in Job to Leander. After his return to the Peninsula, Leander was instrumental in persuading Leovigild's younger son and successor, Reccared (r. 586–601), both to convert to Trinitarianism personally in 587 and then to enforce the Nicene Creed in his kingdom at the Third Council of Toledo in 589.

On Leander's death in 600/601, Isidore succeeded him as bishop of Seville. His incumbency was a long one: he was to preside over the see until his death on 4 April 636. Like his brother, he was politically active and his writings reveal a belief that the church ought to play the leading role in the politics of the kingdom.[12] This is seen most clearly in the acta of the Fourth Council of Toledo, over which he presided in 633.[13] He was, however, to be disappointed. While the kingdom was once regarded by scholars as a virtual theocracy (in part because of Isidore's writings), more recent scholarship generally accepts that secular power in the kingdom dominated its ecclesiastical hierarchy.[14] Seville's physical distance from the royal court in Toledo may in itself have limited the degree of influence that Isidore could exercise on the political life of the kingdom.[15]

Isidore's episcopate coincided with the reigns of no fewer than nine kings. His appointment to his see came at the very end of Reccared's reign, and perhaps his brother's close friendship with the king aided his appointment. Reccared was, however, to die within the year, and his young son, Liuva II (r. 601–03), was soon ousted by Witteric (r. 603–10). This was potentially a dangerous time for Isidore, who clearly disliked Witteric, telling us that the latter did "very many forbidden things" (plurima inlicita) during his reign.[16] It does not seem, however, that an attempt to oust Isidore was among Witteric's sins. The king was assassinated in 610 and replaced briefly by Gundemar. On the latter's death in 611, Sisebut became king. King Sisebut (r. 612–21) seems to have been something of an intellectual and also had firm views on the church and Christian faith. His relationship with Isidore was complex and has been interpreted as anything from close friendship to ill-disguised hostility.[17] Certainly, the king's poem on eclipses is dedicated to Isidore and Isidore's De Natura Rerum, and the initial version of Isidore's Etymologies reciprocates the compliment, if compliment it be rather than evidence of rivalry. Sisebut's enthusiastic wish forcibly to convert the Jews in his kingdom drew a rebuke from Isidore, the leading bishop at the Fourth Council of Toledo, which decreed in 633 that such forced conversion should be prohibited.[18] After Sisebut's death, the royal policy towards the Jews is described by Isidore as "not in accord with reason" (non secundum scientiam).[19] Sisebut was succeeded on his death in 621 by his young son Reccared II. Isidore comments cagily that Reccared reigned for a few days, but in fact it is likely that he occupied the throne for at least a year.[20] Reccared was replaced by Suinthila (r. 621–31), upon whom Isidore lavishes fulsome praise in the second version of his Historia Gothorum.[21] Whether he was forced to do so by the new monarch and equally compelled to obscure the circumstances surrounding the demise of Reccared II, or was an enthusiastic partisan of Suinthila cannot be resolved. In 631 an uprising led by Sisenand (r. 631–36) brought about the demise of Suinthila, who in turn was succeeded by Chintila (r. 636–40) just before Isidore's death.[22] We have no evidence for Isidore's views of the latter two kings, though Collins sees the reign of Sisenand as possibly the apogee of Isidore's political influence.[23]

Whatever his impact on contemporary politics, Isidore's effect on intellectual life cannot be doubted.[24] His written output was prodigious, encompassing the fields of theology, history, grammar, science, and church governance, to mention only the most significant fields in which he made an impact.[25] A firm believer in the power of education, he was to declare that "Ignorance is the mother of error, ignorance is the nurse of sins […] for the uneducated man is easily deceived. The fool swiftly falls into vice."[26] He also wished to ground doctrine in concrete knowledge: "All wisdom is derived from knowledge or conjecture. A view based on knowledge is better than that based on conjecture, for the former is true, while the latter doubtful."[27] Much of his work can be seen as an attempt to educate his flock, especially the clergy, whose lack of learning seems to have been a consistent concern for the bishops of the 7th century.[28] While admiring learning, he was nevertheless selective about the past and remained always deeply suspicious of the pagan aspects of classical culture and what he saw as their potentially corrupting influence. Thus, he was eager to prohibit the reading of ancient poetry.[29] Isidore certainly wished to preserve the past, but he was equally determined to recast it and make it fit for a new Christian future.[30] Isidore's concern with protecting the boundary of the Christian community from the potential dangers of outside religious influence—including illicit knowledge—is evidenced in his anti-Jewish writings, works that have been the subject of consistent scholarly debate and which form of the focus of Raúl González Salinero's chapter in the present volume.[31]

Isidore's library and use of sources have been an increasing focus of research in recent decades as scholars have sought to apply digital techniques to decoding his corpus. In the process they have identified many previously unrecognised sources and gained valuable insights into his working practices.[32] The Renotatio librorum domini Isidori is a source that has often been mined for information about Isidore's writings and his contemporary reputation. This short biographical piece was written by his young contemporary Braulio of Zaragoza, and was intended to be appended to Isidore's own De viris illustribus.[33] A translation of the Renotatio follows.[34]

Isidore, an outstanding man, bishop of the church of Seville, the successor and brother of bishop Leander, began his distinguished career in the reigns of the emperor Maurice and king Reccared. In him antiquity reclaimed something of its own, or rather our times saw the knowledge of antiquity reflected in him. He was a man trained in every form of speech so that he could fit his style of address to the uneducated and educated alike. In this way, adapting to the needs of the occasion, he shone with outstanding eloquence.[35] A careful reader could easily learn how great his wisdom was from his diverse studies and the monographs which he wrote. Out of these I have made this list of those which have come to my notice:

He wrote two books of Differentiae in which he distinguished by subtle discrimination the meanings of words that had become blurred through their usage.

He wrote one book of Proemia in which he marked out with concise annotation what each book of the Holy Scriptures contains.

He wrote one book on the Birth and Death of the Fathers in which he noted with concise comments their deeds, rank, death, and the place of their burial.[36]

For his brother, bishop Fulgentius, he wrote two books of Church Offices in which, not neglecting the authority of our forefathers, he interpreted them, and explained the origin of those offices and why everything is so enacted in the Church of God.

He wrote two books of Synonyms which he produced, using reason as his exhortation, for the consolation of the soul and the hope of the pardon we shall obtain.

He dedicated to King Sisebut one book Concerning the Nature of Things in which, using equally the researches of the doctors of the Church and those of the philosophers, he clarified certain obscure matters of the material world.

35 A skill recommended by Gregory the Great, Moralia 30.3.12. Isidore's eloquence is also praised by Ildefonsus of Toledo, De viris illustribus 8.

36 "Concision" here and elsewhere in Braulio's account demonstrates that Isidore's writings possessed the prized virtue of brevitas, see E.R. Curtius, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages (Princeton: 1983), Chapter 13: "Brevity as an ideal of style." On brevity in Isidore's writings, especially the historical works, see: Jamie Wood, "Brevitas in the historical writings of Isidore of Seville," in Early Medieval Spain—A Symposium, eds. Alan Deyermond and Martin J. Ryan (London: 2010), 37–53.

He wrote one book On Numbers in which he deals with part of the science of arithmetic on account of the numbers placed in the Church's writings.

He wrote one book On the Names of the Law and Evangelists in which he showed the mystic meaning of those recorded there.[37]

He wrote one book On Heresies in which, following the example of our forefathers, he gathered together this diffuse material as concisely as he was able.

He wrote three books of Sententiae which he adorned with flowers plucked from the books of Moralia of Pope Gregory.

He wrote one book of Chronicles compiled with great concision starting from the beginning of the world and running down to his own time.

At the request of his sister Florentina, a professed virgin, he wrote two books Against the Jews in which he gives proofs from the testimony of the Law and of the Prophets concerning everything which the Catholic faith believes.

He wrote one book On Famous Men to which we are appending these notes here.

He wrote in one book A Monastic Rule which he edited in a most appropriate fashion for use in his country and the souls of the infirm.

He wrote one book on The Origin of the Goths and the Kingdom of the Sueves, including the History of the Vandals.

He wrote two books of Controversies. He who reads them will recognise a wealth of material taken from the works of old.

The volume of the Etymologies which is of very great length was divided by him by subjects and not into books. This work which he wrote at my request, but left unfinished, I have divided into twenty books.[38] Whoever thoughtfully and often reads through this work which contains every branch of philosophy will, and rightly so, no longer be devoid of understanding in matters both human and divine. In this work, which overflows with the eloquence of diverse arts, he gathered together and summarised almost everything that a man ought to know. There are many other small

[38] Martín, Scripta, 167–68. It has also been suggested that Isidore intended a division into 22 or 24 books, see John Henderson, The Medieval World of Isidore of Seville: Truth from Words (Cambridge: 2007), 20. >
> I believe that after so many years of decline in Spain, God, as if he had set before us a certain goal, raised this man up in these latest times so that we should not altogether grow old in our boorishness. He can deservedly have this philosophical sentiment applied to him by us: "Your books, he said, have, so to speak, brought us home by giving us something that allowed us to know who and where we were, as we strayed through our own city, wandering like strangers. It was you who revealed to us the times of our country, the divisions of time, the laws of the Church and of the priests, public and private conduct, the names of kingdoms, regions, and towns, the names of everything human and divine, their types, their nature, and their cause."[39]
> With what a flood of eloquence and with how many lances forged from the sacred Scriptures or the works of the Fathers he routed the heresy of the Acephalites is attested by the acts of the Councils held before him at Seville where he confronted Gregory the leader of the aforementioned heresy and vindicated the truth of the Catholic Faith.[40]
> He died during the reigns of the Emperor Heraclius and that most Christian king Chintila, both excelling all in his righteous learning and in the generosity of his charitable works.

All the books listed by Braulio are still extant. It has recently been argued that On heresies (De haeresibus), discovered by Ángel Custodio Vega in 1936 and long considered inauthentic, may be of Isidorian authorship after all.[41] Braulio implies that Isidore wrote more than he himself lists, but his catalogue has become accepted as including all of Isidore's major works. Given Isidore's fame, many pseudo-epigraphical works are also to be found.[42] It has also generally been assumed that Braulio lists Isidore's works in chronological order of production.[43] However, a later, shorter list of works composed by Ildefonsus of Toledo does not retain Braulio's order, and so there can be no certainty in this respect.[44] Among Isidore's "opuscula" may be the Versus Isidori, a collection of short poems which were said to have been painted at the top of Isidore's bookcases in Seville.[45] Among the "instrumenta" is possibly the initial edition of the so-called Collectio Canonica Hispana, a compilation of the acta of the ecumenical church councils, some local councils celebrated in Africa and Gaul, and a large number of Iberian councils, concluding with the Fourth Council of Toledo.[46]

Within a few decades of his death, certain of Isidore's works were disseminated rapidly, and knowledge of his exploits was spread throughout Spain and beyond, a topic that is explored in the chapters by Mark Lewis Tizzoni (on the Iberian Peninsula) and Martin J. Ryan (on Ireland and Anglo-Saxon England, mainly). Early hagiographical accounts by Braulio of Zaragoza, Redemptus of Seville, and Ildefonsus of Toledo point towards a concerted effort to channel memories of Isidore shortly after his death, as do positive references in church council records.[47] Citation of Isidore's writings began early in Spain too, with writers such as Braulio, Ildefonsus, and Julian and Eugenius II of Toledo redeploying resources produced by Isidore in their theological, polemical, pastoral, and poetic works across the mid and late 7th century, and no doubt assisting in their rapid transmission beyond the Peninsula. Scholars in Ireland were amongst the earliest and most enthusiastic audiences for his works in the early Middle Ages. In "Isidore Amongst the Islands: Reception and Use of Isidore of Seville in Britain and Ireland in the Early Middle Ages," Martin J. Ryan demonstrates the wide extent of Isidore's influence in England, Ireland and elsewhere in the Atlantic archipelago. He analyses key texts and manuscripts, exploring Isidore's impact on leading insular scholars, such as Aldhelm, Hadrian, Theodore of Canterbury, Bede, and numerous anonymous and pseudonymous Irish authors.

Sinéad O'Sullivan's chapter on Isidore's reception and use in Carolingian and Ottonian Europe develops our understanding of the practical utility of many of Isidore's works in monastic libraries of the 9th, 10th, and 11th centuries. Focussing in particular on the function of the Etymologiae as a reference work, O'Sullivan examines the use of the text in Prudentius, Martianus, and Virgil glosses, and explores the importance of encyclopaedism and etymology, which lies at the heart of Isidore's Etymologiae, within early medieval glossing and textual culture. In particular, the chapter examines one of Isidore's most important sources, Servius, documenting the continuing connection between Isidore and Servius in Virgil manuscripts of the 9th and 10th centuries.

Winston Black examines the influence of Isidore on scholastic Europe, the first English-language study of the later medieval reception of Isidore. Black challenges a prevailing assumption that Isidore and his works, especially the Etymologiae, were rejected in the High Middle Ages, by providing a detailed survey of the "scholastic" reception of Isidore, illustrated with numerous examples from scholastic encyclopaedias, as well as from specific high and later medieval manuscripts. He demonstrates that the Etymologiae remained consistently popular throughout the Middle Ages, but other works, like De Natura Rerum, waned in popularity after the 12th century, while some, like the Synonyma, found exceptional favour toward the end of the Middle Ages. Black shows that "two different Isidores become apparent in any university or monastic libraries of the later Middle Ages: first, a Master Isidore of the Etymologiae, father of encyclopedias, and a revered, albeit antiquated and insufficient, scholar on the natures of things; and second, Saint Isidore of the Sententiae and Synonyma, a teacher of moral and theological truths and a guide to exploring the mystical significances of words and things" (p. 597).

The final two chapters in our volume explore how Isidore fared in the early modern period, in Europe, especially Spain, and the New World. This was the period that saw the production of the first properly critical edition of Isidore's complete works in 1598, a subject touched on in Jeremy Lawrance's chapter. Lawrance shows how Renaissance humanism was not kind to Isidore, and as a result his authority as an encyclopaedist declined sharply. At the same time, the rise of "national" monarchies and the confessional conflicts of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation lent the question of Isidore's sanctity and place within Catholic historia sacra a new urgency, and he became susceptible to appropriation as a contentious symbol of Spanish nationhood. In the final chapter of this volume, Amy Fuller takes us beyond Europe and seeks to unravel whether—and how—Isidore's works were received in the New World. Fuller concludes that Isidore's encyclopaedic efforts may have been an inspiration (if not a direct source) for the Catholic scholars who were entrusted with evangelising, recording and sometimes seeking to understand the indigenous populations with which the Spanish came into contact.

The body of scholarly work on Isidore is of monumental proportions, evidenced by the extensive efforts of Jocelyn N. Hillgarth, Alberto Ferreiro, and Jacques Elfassi to keep track of an ever-expanding bibliography.[48] The past two decades have witnessed something of a flourishing of studies of Isidore in English that goes some way towards matching the volume of Isidorian scholarship in Spanish and French (in particular) in the second half of the 20th century, inspired primarily by the seminal work of Jacques Fontaine on classical influences on Isidore.[49] Scholars have sought to understand the construction of the Etymologiae, his intellectual output more broadly, and the role of history and geography in his view of the world in which he lived.[50] Particularly important has been the 2015 issue of the journal Antiquité Tardive, entitled "Isidore de Séville et son temps," and a tranche of recent publications that have revealed the depth of Isidore's impact in previously unexamined arenas, especially in relation to the transmission of knowledge in the Middle Ages.[51]

The present volume is divided into three parts. Following this synoptic introduction, three chapters address different aspects of the context in which Isidore operated. Santiago Castellanos and Graham Barrett consider Isidore's historical and cultural contexts, respectively, situating the subject of the volume in relation to his contemporaries within Hispania. Purificación Ubric Rabaneda then addresses the important role played by Leander of Seville in the ecclesiastical politics of the late 6th century and in the formation of Isidore, his younger brother. The second part examines Isidore's most important works within the broad categories of theology (Thomas O'Loughlin), history (Jamie Wood), science (Faith Wallis), grammar (José Carracedo Fraga) and etymology (Jacques Elfassi). A common feature of these chapters is the ways in which they demonstrate that Isidore was able to make creative use of the writings of his predecessors and experimented with genre boundaries across a number of different fields of practical and theoretical knowledge. Subsequent chapters take a series of cross-sectional paths through Isidore's writings, relating them to the changing historical contexts in which he was working, considering themes such as pastoral care and church governance (Céline Martin), monasticism and education (Pedro Castillo Maldonado), kingship and law (Andrew Fear), and dealing with "others," such as heretics and Jews (Raúl González Salinero). A final group of chapters in Part 3 explores Isidore's legacy, from his immediate reception in Spain in the 7th century (Mark Lewis Tizzoni) to the transformation of his legacy in the high and late medieval (Winston Black) and early modern (Jeremy Lawrance) periods. These chapters range widely in terms of geography too, from Britain and Ireland (Martin J. Ryan), across western Europe (Immo Warntjes and Sinéad O'Sullivan) and even to the New World (Amy Fuller), demonstrating not only the creative ways in which the knowledge that Isidore had generated could be moulded to new uses in new contexts, but also how Isidore's legacy was challenged, reconfigured, and reaffirmed in the process.

As the papers in this volume demonstrate, the field of Isidorian studies remains a vibrant one. In addition to continuing philological endeavours to establish editions of key works by Isidore, there is a growing—and related—interest in the reception and transmission of his writings throughout the Latin-speaking medieval world, from the cultural heartlands of the Carolingian Empire to more peripheral regions. Another key trend in scholarship is to attempt to disentangle the sources that Isidore had at his disposal and his working practices when using them, especially in relation to figures who are often thought to have had a formative impact on him: Augustine of Hippo, Gregory the Great, and Leander of Seville, his brother. Further studies have sought to situate Isidore within the context of the contemporary Iberian episcopate, on which he is often viewed as having a shaping influence. Less sustained effort has been made to contextualise Isidore—and the Iberian episcopate more generally—within the post-Roman cultural, political and social landscape. Important recent work on the material culture of late antique Iberia, as well as the continued interaction of aristocracies and state powers across the period, has also yet to be related to Isidore, his peers, and his context.[52] While much has been accomplished to understand Isidore and his world, it is clear that much remains to be done.

CHAPTER 2

Isidore of Seville: Historical Contexts

Santiago Castellanos

"Do not forget our little brother Isidore."[1,2] This was the wish expressed by Leander, the bishop of Seville, to his sister Florentina as she made her profession in a nunnery. Afterwards the phrase came to form part of a work dealing with the moral and ascetic training of nuns, which Leander composed specifically for Florentina. The "little brother" was Isidore of Seville. This chapter aims to place Isidore in his historical context by looking at the way he fulfilled his role as a bishop, as the author of a series of literary works, and via his social, political, and religious legacy. It must be conceded, as in previous treatments of Isidore, that in reality we know very little about his personality or the history of his life. Nevertheless, it is possible to engage with his thought and examine the influence that he exercised during his episcopate (*c.*600/602–636).

Isidore was the bishop of an important city in Hispania, Hispalis (the modern Seville), in the first third of the 7th century A.D. This was a period when the Catholic Church was beginning to enjoy a period of political hegemony, which had begun in the previous generation when the regnum Gothorum under Reccared (586–601) converted from Arianism to Catholicism. This is not to say that prior to this, during the late Roman and earlier Visigothic periods, Catholic bishops had not exercised important power and influence in Hispania, but this new alliance with the monarchy gave the clergy a whole new level of authority, and Isidore was to reap the benefits of this new dispensation.

1 Leander of Seville and the Formation of Isidore's World

In the same paragraph of the De institutione uirginum, Leander remarks to his sister Florentina that she had left the region where she was born in her early youth, "the land where they expelled its citizens, and settled foreigners to the loss of its honour, lost its fertility." Where was this region? We are given the answer by Isidore, who in his short biographical sketch of Leander makes it clear that the family hailed from Carthaginiensis and also reveals that their father was called Severianus.[3] The foreigners to whom Leander refers as having occupied Carthaginiensis were none other than the imperial Roman/Byzantine troops who took control of the south-east of Hispania during the civil war between Agila and Athanagild, in the middle of the 6th century, a war which came to an end after the triumph of the latter, who then became the rulers of the regnum Gothorum. The state of our knowledge does not allow us to ascertain the first origins of the family: Leander says that Florentina was born in Carthaginiensis, but this does not necessarily mean that this was also true of Severianus. Indeed, some scholars have suggested that the family's origins lay in Africa. However, upon careful assessment of the available evidence it is impossible to make any statement with certainty on this matter. The reference to Carthaginiensis obscures any firm clue about the family's origins.[4] Afterwards Severianus, his wife, Leander, Fulgentius (who was soon to become bishop of Ecija), and Florentina (who took monastic vows) settled in Baetica, the most southerly of the Spanish provinces. It is quite possible that Isidore was born in Seville. Sometime before 579 Leander became bishop of Seville, and it is from this time that we are able to trace his political, religious, and intellectual career more clearly.[5]

[5] It is not certain that his mother's name was Turtur, despite the opinion of Jacques Fontaine, Isidore de Séville. Genèse et originalité de la culture hispanique au temps des Wisigoths (Turnhout: 2000), 89–90. She was perhaps abbess of the monastery to which Florentina belonged, José Carlos Martín, "Isidoro de Sevilla: su familia, su vida, su producción escrita," in Escritos medievales en honor del obispo Isidoro de Sevilla (Turnhout: 2017), 14–53, esp. 23. It has been suggested that Leander and his family were supporters of the Byzantine occupation. This is the view of Jacques Fontaine and of Pierre Cazier, "Qui a chassé de Carthaginoise Sévérianus et les siens? Observations sur l'histoire familiale d'Isidore de Séville," in Estudios en Homenaje

Isidore tells us that Leander's career flourished during the reign of Reccared, which allows us to suppose that he died before December 601, the date of Reccared's own death. It is impossible to know how precise Isidore wishes to be here, but in any event we can assume that Leander died *c.*600/601, perhaps even in 602.[6] Isidore records some of the works written by his brother, singling out two polemical works against Arianism which have sadly not survived. The first was Against the Doctrines of the Heretics, written in two books, and the second was a smaller work titled Against the claims of the Arians. Leander wrote other works such as the De institutione uirginum et de contemptu mundi, which he dedicated to his sister; letters; and homilies, including the famous homily delivered at the Third Council of Toledo, which will be referred to below.[7] As regards the exile which Isidore mentions Leander endured, this is most likely the journey that Leander made to Constantinople. Like many other events in Leander's life, we know neither the date of this journey nor the date of his return to Hispania. Pope Gregory the Great would later dedicate his Moralia in Job to Leander, and its dedicatory preface states that the journey was made "for reasons concerning the faith of the Visigoths." It is clear that Gregory and Leander met and became friends in Constantinople, one being there as the papal envoy to the imperial court and the other there for "reasons of faith." The majority of modern commentators believe that these "reasons" were the war which had broken out in 579 in Hispania between King Leovigild and his son. Leovigild was an Arian, while Hermenegild had converted to Catholicism, a don Claudio Sánchez Albornoz en sus 90 años (Buenos Aires: 1983), 353. However, the disdain expressed towards the "foreigners" who had occupied Carthaginiensis makes this difficult to believe, even though years after leaving this region he was forced to travel Constantinople to negotiate for imperial support for Hermenegild. A more likely scenario is that proposed by Abilio Barbero, "El conflicto de los Tres Capítulos y las iglesias hispánicas en los siglos VI y VII," in La sociedad visigoda en su entorno histórico (Madrid: 1992), 136–67, especially 161, using the text sent to Florentina as evidence for Leander's hostility to the empire. There is much to commend the caution of María Adelaida Andrés Sanz, "Leandro de Sevilla," in La Hispania visigótica y mozárabe. Dos épocas en su literature, ed. Carmen Codoñer (Salamanca: 2010), 63–68, which has been reiterated with respect to both Leander and Isidore by Isabel Velázquez, Latine dicitur, vulgo vocant. Aspectos de la lengua escrita y hablada en las obras gramaticales de Isidoro de Sevilla (Logroño: 2003).

For the date of Reccared's death, see Laterculus regum Visigothorum 28. The possibility of 602 depends on the Epitaphium Leandri, Isidori et Florentinae, Martín, "Isidoro de Sevilla," 37.

though it is unclear whether he did this prior to the war or during it. Leander's journey to the imperial court under such circumstances suggests that it stemmed from a need to seek imperial support for Hermenegild's cause. Recent investigations into this affair appear to show that the emperor did indeed promise some sort of help but that this came to nothing, as shortly afterwards Leovigild was to pay him a substantial number of solidi. If we believe Gregory the Great, Leander returned shortly before the death of Leovigild, which occurred in 586.[8]

According to our sources, Hermenegild's conversion to Catholicism would have taken place around 579. Our Iberian sources make no mention of it. Both John of Biclarum and Isidore describe Hermenegild as a tyrannus, or usurper. In his De viris illustribus (there is nothing in his Historia Gothorum) Isidore notes the role his brother played in the conversion of the Goths, but he makes no mention of Hermenegild, let alone that Leander was implicated in his revolt. John of Biclarum probably made a cryptic reference to Leander's opposition to Leovigild. But he also initiated the practice of presenting Hermenegild as a usurper and thus says nothing about his relationship with Leander. Up to 580 Leovigild was seeking forms of a liturgy that would allow Catholics to convert to Arianism, which suggests that religious issues had become part of the conflict. Outside the Visigothic kingdom Hermenegild was seen as a martyr of the Catholic Church. For this reason Gregory of Tours, for example, champions the Frankish princess Ingundis, Hermenegild's wife, and Gregory the Great praises Leander himself. Ingundis was the daughter of Brunhild and Sigibert, and thus had Visigothic blood, given that Brunhild was the daughter of King Atanagild and Goswintha, who was married to Leovigild. John of Biclarum seems to imply that Goswintha was to blame for the war when he says that it began as a domestic dispute. He places a phrase in the ablative which appears to speak of action on the part of Goswintha's faction which grammatically is best interpreted as showing that he is blaming the group that had supported the factione Gosuinthe regine tirannidem assumens. In Merovingian Gaul, Gregory of Tours does mention Hermenegild's conversion, as did Gregory the Great, writing in Rome. Both of these authors were writing towards the end of the 6th century, shortly after the conflicts they describe and of which they were direct contemporaries. On the other hand, it is clear that in the regnum Gothorum itself that care was taken to pass over this event in silence, something found in all our key sources (council acta, John of Biclarum, and Isidore) written during or after Reccared's reign.[9] Hermenegild's presence in Seville and his association with Leander cannot be doubted if we trust the testimony of Gregory, who makes this clear in the above-mentioned passage from his Dialogues. Gregory states that he knew (cognouimus) about these events from many (multorum) who visited him ab Hispaniarum partibus. Given the friendship the two had formed in Constantinople, Gregory's source was probably Leander.

Unidad y diversidad de un reinado* (Madrid: 2008), 118; and Margarita Vallejo, Hispania y Bizancio. Una relación desconocida (Madrid: 2012), 249ff. Leovigild paid the Byzantines 30,000 solidi, according to Gregory of Tours, Decem libri historiarum 5.38. Bishop Licinianus met Leander on his return from Constantinople, as he records in 595 in a letter addressed to Gregory the Great, but we cannot give a precise date for their encounter, Licinianus, Epistola 1. In an entry dating to 584/585, John of Biclarum, Chronicon 77, gives a heading which refers to Leander's "splendour": "Leander Ispalensis ecclesie episcopus clarus habetur." García Moreno, Leovigildo, 22–23, n. 15, has suggested that, like other headings in John's Chronicle, it is likely that this compliment refers to his opposition to Leovigild.

We can see Leovigild's hand in the religious dimension of the conflict, as in his council of 580 he sought to build bridges that would allow the conversion of Catholics to Arianism, and he conflicted with the Catholic bishops, conflicts which would later be presented as anti-Catholic persecution on his part.[10] During the reign of Reccared and the conversion of the kingdom to Catholicism after the Third Council of Toledo in 589, letters written by Gregory to Leander show once again their friendship and the level of influence Leander enjoyed, even during the reign of Reccared, who, we must remember, had been an enemy of Hermenegild, and thus presumably of Leander, in the civil war. Nevertheless, there was a political realignment after Hermenegild's defeat upon the accession of Reccared in 586, and Leander went on to hold powerful political influence, which reached its peak at the Third Council of Toledo in 589 and in the Homily that he delivered to the king, bishops, and leading lay members of the royal court.[11] When Leander died, at a date that cannot be fixed with certainty but which, as we have seen, can be placed between 599 and 602, Catholicism was the official religion of the Visigothic kingdom and Hermenegild remembered simply as a usurper, tyrannus, with both his conversion to Catholicism and any hint that Leander had taken part in his uprising buried in silence. Leander's younger brother, Isidore, succeeded him as bishop of Seville.

2 Isidore as an Author in a Cultural Context

This is, perhaps, the most well-known aspect of Isidore's life. He was the author of a whole series of writings in different genres, including historiae, a chronicle, letters, poetry, lexicographical studies, the compilation of the knowledge of the past and present eras, works on religious and political morality, and ecclesiastical and monastic discipline, He enjoyed a long episcopate which ran from around 600/602 until his death in 636. I will not give a full list of his literary output here, but rather a small selection from it. The essential detailed discussion of his works and life is that of Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz in his introduction to the Etymologiae.[12] Isidore's friend Braulio, the bishop of Saragossa, wrote a Renotatio librorum domini Isidori, a short resumé of Isidore's works. Braulio and Isidore knew one another personally, perhaps since 625/626, and kept up a long correspondence, although we only have some of the letters that they exchanged.[13]

[13] On the date of the possible first meeting and the correspondence between Braulio and Isidore, see now the new edition (and introduction) of the letters, by Ruth Miguel Franco and José Carlos Martín, Braulionis Caesaraugustani Epistulae et Isidori Hispalensis

Just as the date of Isidore's letters has been re-evaluated, similar debates have begun concerning the dates of Isidore's other works. This is most striking with regard to the Sententiae, a work for which Cazier and Fontaine have proposed a late date, around 633, while Martín Iglesias suggests *c.*614/615, using as evidence the use that Sisebut made of this work in his hagiography of Desiderius of Vienne, the Vita Desiderii, his problems with Brunhild, and the final triumph of Chlothar II. The Sententiarum libri tres deals with matters of religion and morality but also focuses on the correct way to exercise political power, forming a guide to how, in Isidore's opinion, a king should conduct himself.[14]

Martín Iglesias has also suggested that Isidore's first work—or at least one of the first—was his De viris illustribus, on the grounds that it makes no mention of the death of Eutropius of Valencia, who played a key role at, for example, the Third Council of Toledo; nor does it mention the deaths of Maximus of Zaragoza or John of Biclarum. He also argues convincingly that the early dating of the De viris illustribus is shown in the way that the works of authors from the 6th and 7th centuries that Isidore cites in other, probably later, works are not found in the De viris illustribus. It is therefore likely that the De viris illustribus was written prior to the Etymologiae, De natura rerum, and De ortu et obitu patrum, which have normally been seen as the first of Isidore's works.[15]

From the correspondence between Braulio and Isidore we can see that Braulio had no access to the text of the Etymologiae until the beginning of the 630s, despite having asked for a copy from at least 625/626. The Etymologiae took a long period to write and edit. They were begun at the beginning of Sisebut's reign (612), and a first version dedicated to the king began to circulate towards the end of his reign, *c.*620 (Sisebut died in 621), but Isidore continued to work on them until around 632/633. The work is often, and with good reason, referred to as an "encyclopedia," as it gathers together an enormous amount of data over a wide-ranging field of subjects, including botany, mathematics, rhetoric and grammar, and religion. Originally the work was dedicated to King Sisebut (612–21), as shown in the dedicatory preface of the first edition, which has been preserved in various manuscripts. But its final version was dedicated to Braulio. We ought not to read the reference made to Isidore in Braulio's epistula II as an indication that he had commissioned the work from him. However, it is clear that in 632/633 he reminded him that it had been seven years since he had asked to see it, and in the Renotatio, written after the deaths of Isidore and Sisebut, Braulio was proud to claim that he had commissioned the work ("he had it copied at my request"). Years later, when Ildefonsus of Toledo wrote his De viris illustribus he appears in his chapter on Isidore to have accepted Braulio's version of events. When Braulio finally obtained a copy of the Etymologiae he saw it was not divided into books, but by themes. He quickly altered this and divided the work into books.[16]

Isidore dedicated his De natura rerum to King Sisebut at the same time as the king in turn dedicated to the bishop of Seville his own Carmen de eclipsibus solis et lunae, a work written in hexameters that deals with lunar eclipses. The long list of Isidore's works could have been arranged in broad thematic groups, a view recently championed by Codoñer, Andrés, and Martín, and which is followed in this chapter. Thus, we encounter pedagogic works, such as De natura rerum or the first book of the Differentiae; those dealing with biblical exegesis, such as the Prooemia, De ortu et obitu patrum, Allegoriae, and Liber numerorum; works on monastic discipline, like the Regula monachorum; works on ecclesiastical discipline, such as the De ecclesiasticis officiis and his revision of the Collectio Hispana of church councils; works in the defence of religious orthodoxy, such as the second book of the Differentiae, the De fide catholica contra [16] I accept here the dates proposed by Ruth Miguel Franco and José Carlos Martín in their new edition of the Epistolarium of Braulio, cited in n. 13. Braulio's request for the Etymologiae, ep. II (in the enumeration of Ruth Miguel Franco and José Carlos Martín, dated now post-631). In Ep. IV (normally dated to c.632/633), Braulio complains to Isidore that he asked for the work seven years ago (as Martín and Miguel Franco explain, this would have been during their first personal meeting in 625/626); after this, Isidore, when he finally sent Braulio a copy of the Etymologiae, told him he was sending the text and hoped he would correct it, as he found himself in poor health and had not been able to finish revising it (Ep. V, dated to c.632–33). On the long period of the Etymologiae's composition, see Díaz y Díaz, "Introducción," 172–74, and Martín, Scripta, 79–80 and 258–59 (and also his views, contra Díaz y Díaz, on the role played by Sisebut). Braulio's pride is expressed in the phrase quia rogatu meo fecit, Braulio, Renotatio 44, which Martín believes probably suggests that Braulio is referring to the copies that he made of the text (Scripta, 78), and therefore my translation of the sentence. See also Ildefonsus, De viris illustribus 8. On the Etymologiae, see the chapter by Jacques Elfassi in the present volume.

Iudaeos; and, of course, historical works, such as the De viris illustribus, Chronica, De origine Gothorum, Vandalorum et Sueuorum, and, in a certain fashion, the De haeresibus. Regarding the letters attributed to him, at least seven appear to be authentic: the six sent to Braulio and the one, preserved in some manuscripts, sent to Sisebut along with the Etymologiae. The authenticity of the letter sent to Heladius of Toledo remains doubtful.[17]

Isidore's main historical work is the Historiae, in which he deals with the Visigoths, Sueves, and Vandals. The most consulted and influential section of this is indubitably the first section, the De origine Gothorum, customarily cited as the Historia Gothorum. The work has come down to us in both a long and a short version, and there has been a long debate over which of the two is the earlier, with different theories proposed. At present the majority of scholars appear to believe that the short version is the earlier of the two and that the two versions can be dated to 621 and 626, respectively. Isidore finished the first version shortly after the death of Sisebut; at the end of it he suggests that the king had been poisoned. The final chapters of the second version were written during the life of King Suinthila and eulogise him above all because he finally expelled imperial troops from Spanish soil. As we shall see in the following section, seven years later, at the Fourth Council of Toledo, Isidore was to show himself to be much less of an enthusiast for this king. The Chronicle, like the Historiae, was written in two versions, one produced in 615 and the other in 625/626. In both, Isidore's principal aim was to show that the Visigoths were central to God's plans for mankind and superior to the Romans and other peoples.[18]

Isidore died in 636. Concerning his death we have a text written by one of the clergy of Seville, Redemptus, Obitus beatissimi Isidori Hispalensis episcopi, which formally is a letter written to a bishop or abbot but in fact takes on the form of a work of hagiography. This tells us that as he was dying, Isidore called on the bishops John of Elepla and Eparcius of Italica, two sees very close to Seville, to administer the rite of penance to him in the church of San Vicente. The subject of the text is the confession, penance, and death of Isidore, and it gives us a date for that death: 4 April 636.[19]

3 Isidore as Bishop in Social, Religious, and Political Contexts

If Leander predeceased Reccared, who died in December 601 and was succeeded by his son, Liuva II, Isidore would already have been bishop of Seville when the new king began his reign. Until his death in 636 Isidore was not only, as we have just seen, a prolific author, but he also participated directly in important affairs of state. This section will attempt to reconstruct his political biography as much as possible in terms of this participation, and also to examine the core principles of his religious, social, and political beliefs. The period during which he held his episcopate and wielded influence was the product, in political terms, of the recent conversion of the regnum Gothorum to Catholicism in which his brother had played a key role. It is this author's view that to a great extent Isidore followed in his brother's footsteps, with regard to both his hostility to Byzantium and his belief that there should be an active role for the episcopate to play in political matters and the religious and social decision-making process of the elite of the regnum. Aspects of these elements of his episcopate will be examined below.

The efforts of Leovigild's family to consolidate themselves as a ruling dynasty came to an end with the success of the coup d'état led by Witteric in 603, which led to the overthrow of Liuva II. If we are to believe the hagiographic Fathers of Merida, the new king (603–10) had previously participated in the uprising in Merida against Masona and in the finally against Reccared himself *c.*587–88. Isidore was no great supporter of Witteric, judging by his comments on the king in the Historia Gothorum. Therefore, this short and negative biographical sketch of Witteric was more or less reproduced in texts of the post-Visigothic era, such as the Chronica Byzantia-arabica of the mid-8th century. It is clear that Isidore wrote not a single word about the foreign alliances that Witteric engineered with Chlothar II of Neustria, Theudebert II of Austrasia, or the Lombard Agiulf against Theuderic II of Burgundy, who in the end refused to marry Witteric's daughter, Ermenberg. The reign of Gundemar, though very short (610–12), shows us that Isidore was one of the signatories to the so-called Decretum Gundemari, which established the metropolitan status of Toledo over the province of Carthaginiensis. From the letters of the governor of Narbonensis, Bulgar, we learn that during Witteric's reign there were wars, about which Isidore says nothing, being fought between the Visigoths and Franks in the south of Gaul.[20]

Isidore mentions Witteric in Historia Gothorum 58; see also the Chronica Byzantia-arabica 3. On Ermenberg and Witteric's foreign policy, Fredegar, Chronicon 4.30–31. Sisebut (612–21) and Isidore seem to have had a close relationship. As we have already seen, the king dedicated his poem on lunar eclipses to Isidore, and the bishop of Seville repaid the compliment with his De natura rerum and the first edition of the Etymologiae. A close reading indicates that the words Isidore used to describe Sisebut's reign in the Historia Gothorum and the Chronica suggest that he wished his readers to evaluate it in a positive manner. Isidore gives a favourable judgement of the king's military policy. Here he singles out Sisebut as clarus and gives details about his campaigns against the peoples of the north of the Iberian Peninsula. He also alludes to the king's campaigns against the imperial army, which, since the war between Agila and Athanagild in the middle of the 6th century, had occupied coastal areas in the east and south of the peninsula. Although both Witteric and Gundemar had also recently campaigned against the Byzantines, Isidore states that Sisebut defeated imperial forces twice and leads us to understand that he had opened negotiations about exchanging prisoners. Isidore ended the short version of the Historia with the death of Sisebut, which he says was due to illness or poisoning. As has already been said, it is this version that probably circulated after the death of the king at the beginning of 621, and afterwards Isidore worked on extending the Historia (the so-called long version), which ended in 626 with an account of the reign of Suinthila, celebrating his success in expelling the Byzantines.[21]

Isidore's views on the king's policy towards his Jewish subjects, on the other hand, are not so positive. On occasion, such as in his De ecclesiasticis officiis, Isidore praises certain aspects of Judaism, such as its preservation of the tradition of reading scripture in synagogues. He had, however, no qualms—indeed, rather the opposite—in asserting that it was a religion of deicides. This can be seen in his De fide catholica contra Iudaeos, which was probably written at the beginning of Sisebut's reign. The work, which was dedicated to his sister Florentina and educational in its intent, makes clear the deicidal aspect of Judaism which, as is well known, was one of the foundations for hostility towards the Jews in the Middle Ages and beyond. As has been suggested by several authors, we ought to recognise the profound influence that eschatological thinking had on Isidore's ideas here, especially after the Persians captured Jerusalem in 614, and the Jews' role in the city's fall. When he was compiling his Chronicle in 615 Isidore makes scant reference to the topic in the life of Sisebut: "he converted the Jewish subjects of his kingdom to the faith of Christ." However, in both the short version of the Historia Gothorum, which ends with Sisebut's death, and the long version, which continues to the reign of Suinthila, Isidore criticises the conversion of the Jews to Catholicism by force "but without understanding." Careful reading of the text shows that the force of Isidore's criticism is not that the Jews were converted per se, but that this was done by force, adding that it should have been undertaken "for reasons of faith." What is clear is that Sisebut's actions mark an increase in hostility toward the Jews in the regnum Gothorum, reinforcing decisions taken in the reign of Reccared. It was in this way that the king was to take action against "the accursed perfidy of the Jews." A law promulgated at the beginning of his reign and following the precedent of the late Roman Empire forbade Jewish masters from continuing to own Christian slaves. Proselytising by Jews was to be punished by death and the confiscation of belongings. Isidore's dislike of this policy probably centred on his disapproval of king's intervention in religious matters, and it is certainly the case that at times the king did intervene forcefully in this field. We can see this in the letters he sent to Bishop Eusebius of Tarragona and Bishop Caecilius of Mentesa, rebuking the former for his love of the theatre at a time when he was dealing with the appointment of the next bishop of Barcelona (which belonged to the province of Tarraconensis, of which Eusebius was the metropolitan bishop), and the latter for his intention to retire in order to pursue a monastic career.[22] Isidore was certainly no friend of the Jews and criticises Sisebut's excesses not so much because of his actions towards them but rather because he took what Isidore considers to be a despotic attitude, on the grounds that he had not taken advice from his bishops (and certainly not from Isidore) when making decisions on this matter.

Isidore's direct intervention in collective decisions made by the bishops of the realm can be seen not only in his participation in the council of Gundemar but his role in the Second Council of Seville, held in 619. Church councils, especially after the conversion of the regnum to Catholicism under Reccared, had become a mechanism for making political as well as ecclesiastical decisions. This can be seen in the fact that the prelates dealt with, inter alia, matters concerning the regulation of a variety of institutions, social relations, and the role of church property in the wider community. The council in Seville followed Roman tradition closely. This, in this author's opinion, can be attributed to the influence of Isidore and is seen in its formal arrangements and its references to traditional legislation. It is worth noting the presence at this council, held with a province-wide remit for the province of Baetica, of Sisisclus, the "rectore rerum publicarum," and Suanila, the "rectore rerum fiscalium," i.e. senior secular functionaries of the regnum. The Council touched on various matters, including boundaries between dioceses which were to be returned to their former state, having previously been lost to the Byzantines and only recently recovered by the Visigoths. Other concerns were simple territorial disputes, such as that between Fulgentius of Ecija (Isidore's brother) and Honorius of Cordoba. Various points were made about ecclesiastical discipline, including an establishment of the correct episcopal hierarchy in the province. There was also a debate with an easterner who in the eyes of the assembled clergy was an acephalic heretic of the Monophysite tradition. This debate finally concluded with his recognition of Catholic orthodoxy as defined by the council.

In 622/624, during the reign of Suinthila, a further council, the third, was held in Seville. This was excluded from the Colección Canónica Hispana, a compilation of late- and post-Roman conciliar acts that were collated in various recensions during the course of the 7th century and of which Isidore is thought to have been one of the main editors. The result was that its acta have not survived, and we only have allusions to them in other council records. At this meeting of 622/624, where Isidore's would have been the decisive voice, Bishop Martianus of Ecija was condemned for defaming the king, Suinthila, consulting a soothsayer about the king's life, and holding inappropriate relations with women, including a slave. The Council's delegates deposed Martianus, appointing his accuser, Aventius, in his place. The story of Martianus's redress was a long one and only came to an end after Isidore's death when, at the Sixth Council of Toledo in 638, Martianus was finally restored to his see. In 633, at the Fourth Council of Toledo, where Isidore was again likely the most influential participant, Aventius's machinations ought to have been clear and Martianus restored to his episcopal rank. But he was not restored to Ecija. Given these facts it appears that Isidore remained hostile to Martianus throughout his life and that it was only after his death that the bishop was able to recover his see.[23]

[23] For the new role which the councils came to play after Reccared's conversion, Castellanos, Los Godos y la Cruz, and for them and for the later councils, Rachel Stocking, Bishops,

As had happened in the case of the deposition of Liuva II by Witteric in 603, Sisebut's dynastic plans came to nothing. He had planned to pass power on to his son, Reccared II, who in any event only remained on the throne for a short time. In 621 Suinthila (621–31) came to power. Suinthila had been one of Sisebut's generals, and military actions features strongly in what we know of his reign. He campaigned, for example, against the Basques in the north. His most well-known exploit was his victory over the Byzantines, resulting in their final expulsion from Hispania. Isidore praised this victory at great length, although we must not forget that the final version of his Chronicle, like that of the Historia Gothorum, came to a close in 626, just after the expulsion of the Byzantines but still in Suinthila's reign. The fragments concerning Suinthila which were added to the Chronicle are, like the rest of the text, scanty. In the Historia Gothorum, despite the brevity imposed by its genre, Isidore's comments are eulogistic. He underlines that Suinthila occupied the lands the imperial troops had managed to retain and was the first king to rule over all Spania. Isidore, who wrote this account in 626, wished to promote the notion that under Suinthila the regnum of the Visigoths had reached its apogee: if the kingdom had attained religious unity with Reccared, it now achieved territorial unity under Suinthila. It was with this event that Isidore decided to end the Historia Gothorum—an apotheosis which continues in Chapters 63–65, where he praises the king's campaigns and his virtues, such as his sharing the throne with his son Reccimer. This was another attempt to set up a dynastic succession in the manner attempted by both Reccared, who had succeeded his father and sought to pass on power to his son, and Sisebut. Isidore's writing shows that he was happy with the intended succession of Reccimer, describing him as "worthy to accede to the kingdom." In any event, Suinthila's family did not remain in power long. In 631, a coup devised in Narbonensis and led by Sisenand was successful. This Gothic magnate enjoyed the support of the Frankish king Dagobert. He paid for this with a substantial amount of gold: first in the form of a missorium which had once been given to the Goths by Aetius, and later with a further 200,000 solidi. A Frankish army commanded by Abundantius and Venerandus penetrated as far as Saragossa, where Sisenand was proclaimed king. Fredegar, a Frankish chronicler, justified the coup by implying councils, and consensus in the Visigothic Kingodm, 589–633 (Ann Arbor: 2000). that Suinthila had proven to be a bad king, stating that he had provoked all the magnates of his kingdom.[24]

4 Conclusion

In the middle of the 8th century, the author of what is now called the Mozarabic Chronicle of 754 stressed the importance of the council called in Toledo during the third year of Sisenand's reign, and noted the presence of Isidore and Braulio.[25] This was the Fourth Council of Toledo, held in 633, at which Isidore played an important role. The council dealt with a disparate series of matters, and Isidore's influence on it is clear. Its condemnation of Suinthila and recognition of Sisenand, who, as has been shown, came to power by force, deposing his predecessor, is particularly striking. Isidore had obviously changed his public stance on Suinthila, which was now very different from what he had written in 625/626 in the second edition of the Historia Gothorum. In some ways its canons firmly reflect the themes prevalent in Isidore's earlier works, such as opposition to the Jews, ecclesiastical discipline, and ethics. The Toledan council of 633 was to present, with the blessing of his colleagues, a summary of Isidore's thought on a wide variety of subjects. There are fulsome views on the behaviour of bishops, clergymen, and even monks. However, the council also dealt with the question of the Jews, banning them from holding offices and from owning slaves (cc. 65 and 66). These canons discuss the conversion of the Jews but assert that, despite the actions of Sisebut, Jewish rites continued to be practised, and they exhorted bishops to investigate this problem and force those concerned to convert to the true faith. The verb used here, coerceat (c. 59), leaves no doubt about what is intended and contradicts a previous canon which proscribes the use of force as a means of converting Jews (c. 57). Apart from the Jews, another important preoccupation of the council was the ownership of slaves and control of freedmen. There are various canons dedicated to these matters. Perhaps the most striking of the bishops' views here is that which insists, under Isidore's influence, that the obligations that its freed slaves owed to the Church "would never die" (c. 70, on ecclesiastical freedmen).

The most notable canon of the Fourth Council of Toledo is probably number 75. This summarises Isidore's views on monarchy and attempts to put into practice his demand for episcopal participation in the election of the monarch. The council of 633 was perhaps the high point of Isidore's direct participation in the political life of the regnum Gothorum and the culmination of his religious, cultural, and social thinking. The idea of a kingdom united by its Catholic faith and monarchy with a secure territory, the ideological grounding of which Isidore had earlier expounded in his Laus Spaniae, combined with the direct participation of bishops in the running of its affairs, is clearly visible at every turn in the acta of the Council—and in a great number of Isidore's other writings.[26]

[26] The text known as De laude Spaniae is the beginning of Isidore's Historiae. In this text, Isidore offers a hyperbolic elegy of Spania, focussing on the country's geography and natural resources. CHAPTER 3

God's Librarian: Isidore of Seville and His Literary Agenda

Isidore of Seville could be a man of few words: about himself and his project above all.[2] No one can read his works, the Etymologies especially, without forming an impression of a writer "in something of a time-warp," but what exactly was he up to?[3] Confronted by an absence of obvious motivation for his vast output across many genres, we have in the main played the get-out-of-jail-free card of "educating the clergy," substituting assumed audience and (much more profitably) reception history for probing authorial intention.[4] One obstacle to getting a handle on Isidore is that "the bibliography"—both his and ours—"is of cosmic proportions."[5] Here I shall not even pretend to be treating him in the round; instead I mean only to offer a series of impressionistic semblanzas of what I understand to be the essential elements of his context, personality, and literary agenda.[6] It is always tempting to appoint Isidore a squadron leader for the rescue corps of the classics, confining debate to the mission's chances of success, but when viewed through the lens of the Visigothic slate texts and their evidence for a continuous history of Latin literacy in the Iberian Peninsula, he comes newly into focus as operating still very much in a late Roman cultural world.[7] If we read his letters with care, we recognise too that Isidore was altogether less worldly than we have made him out to be; his priorities lay elsewhere, his thought and energy were spent in constant revision of both ancient knowledge and Patristic exegesis, memorialised in the complex transmission of his opera. And by attending in particular to his prefaces to those works, we perceive an anxious determination to render the universal manageable—and on his own particular terms.

"The compiler (compilator)," says he, "is one who combines the words of another with his own, as makers of pigment traditionally grind up various ingredients mixed in a mortar. The poet of Mantua was accused of this crime once … He answered, 'Great strength is needed to prise the club of Hercules from his grasp.'"[8] Like Virgil taking Dante by the hand, Isidore can seem like a tour guide to a vast museum of antiquities.[9] But open the Etymologies to any page and its author will stare out at you in a different mask. He lives in Christian time: "in a Christian mouth, the names for the days of the week sound nicer."[10] He distills Christian knowledge: the Bible and ecclesiastical offices; God, angels, and the saints; the Church and deviant sects.[11] Yet he lives too in pagan time: "with this foot (bacchius) the Bacchanalia—that is, the ceremonies of the god Liber—are celebrated."[12] He distills pagan knowledge: "We also read of the burnt sacrifice which the Arcadians offered their god Lycaeus, and whoever consumed it was transfigured into a beast. This does not seem altogether doubtful."[13] Of course, he rejects ancient religion: "in this spectacle they soil themselves with the worship of their gods … impure divinities possess the circus."[14] And he refutes its claims: "this has been entirely confabulated by the poets, in an attempt to enhance their gods with some figures of speech; historiography reveals them to be fallen and full of the ignominy of shame."[15] He writes instead as a Christian: "Amongst us Christians, the first to write a history was Moses."[16] But he also writes, crucially, as a Latin: "Ennius was the first to use it (elegiac metre) amongst us Latin speakers."[17] All these are guises of a single author, who held in his grip the great chain of language, stretching from pagan antiquity to his Christian era: "in the fiction of poetry the winds, to signal their speed, are said to have wings; so also Holy Scripture says, 'he rides on the wings of the winds' (Psalm 104:3)."[18] What I hope to show in the following pages is that Isidore of Seville, seen in the mirror of his own words, aimed not to become catechist to centuries of priests and monks, nor indeed to achieve any great stylistic or generic innovation as such, but to carry through the scholarly project which he had set for himself: to take full stock of classical civilisation and recatalogue it for good in the epistemology of God.

1. The Stone Guest

The kingdom of the Visigoths in Iberia has long revelled gaily in historiographical esteem for its literate and literary culture, enjoying a reputation far greater than the Alans and so many other barbarian neighbours, with a respectable proxime accessit reserved perhaps for Ostrogothic Italy.[19] Ultimately this derives from an apparent intellectual sophistication, realised in and propagated through an "Isidorian Renaissance": study of the basics of a classical education in creative fusion with Christian doctrine by Isidore in Seville and his episcopal successors in 7th-century Zaragoza and Toledo.[20] Beyond the bright foreground of such bookish bishops, meanwhile, the literacy of the laity has been presumed as much as proven, fortified by encouraging noises from the Visigothic law code, in which documents remain a major intermediary of transaction, and the Visigothic legal formulary, in which the endurance of a public notariate seems indicated. Yet the balance of the evidence gives voice primarily to a social elite: a clutch of classicising compositions by King Sisebut and Count Bulgar in the first decades of the 7th century, some legislative references to lay judges on the job, and certain hagiographical cameos made by educated laymen.[21] Visigothic society, in other words, has a Roman feel, of the classics and of cultivation, of things still done by the book, which has seemed to find retrospective confirmation in the more richly documented kingdoms and counties established in the Christian north after the Islamic conquest of the Peninsula in 711. There the use of charters was routine amongst the laity as well as ecclesiastics, while both norms and procedures laid out in the Visigothic law code were explicitly in force at local courts staffed by laymen, albeit with a pronounced clerical and monastic presence.[22]

Ex Toleto semper aliquid novi—it is all thanks to the Second Council of Toledo: credit this ecclesiastical oversight activity in 527 with ensuring the continuation of Latin learning in Iberia.[23] The first canon provides en passant that the bishop should see to the education of child oblates until the age of 18, when they might manifest, regrettably, a desire for married life; scholars, observing renewed effort at the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633 to ameliorate sacerdotal ignorance, have detected a trend between these points, the early medieval Church attaching progressively greater importance to the schooling of its members.[24] If so, the fruit was not immediate. The 6th century offers scant prolegomenon to the achievements of Isidore and his elder brother Leander: leaving to one side Paschasius of Dume and Martin of Braga, twin leading lights of the Suevic intelligentsia, what we have amounts to the biblical commentaries of Apringius of Beja and Justus of Urgell, the epistles of Eutropius of Valencia, Licinianus of Cartagena, and Montanus of Toledo, and the chronicle of John of Vallclara.[25] Isidore profiles all those authors, Montanus excepted, in his bio-bibliography On Illustrious Men, with the additions of Justinianus of Valencia, Severus of Malaga, and Maximus of Zaragoza, whose works may or may not be lost; there is scarcely a hint of any literary hinterland existing beyond this roster.[26] Should we therefore join company with those who envision "the last Father" of the Latin West as the churchman, so to speak, in an age of decline, steeling himself to save an entire culture?[27]

There is, in fact, contemporary evidence for reconstructing literacy at a less exalted level: the Visigothic pizarras or slates, 163 texts and uncounted numerical inscriptions, almost all fragmentary, found (and still being found) scattered across the northern Meseta, mainly in the rural environs of Ávila and

Salamanca, though also farther afield.[28] The majority, to judge by palaeography, come from the 6th and 7th centuries, but stratigraphic context has dated some numerical finds as far back as the late 4th or early 5th century.[29] As such, the slates, through their many different uses in everyday note-taking and record-keeping, land management, business transactions and legal affairs, teaching, learning, and Christian religious practice, document a continuity in the social centrality of practical, functional lay literacy from the late Roman world proper to the end of the Visigothic period (and beyond).[30] Despite the rustic setting, this literacy was to a degree commonplace: with our own eyes we see many hands capable of writing a comprehensible Latin, even as we find no trace of local schools or ecclesiastical structures of securely contemporary date.[31] The slates themselves provide the evidence for the underlying education, in that a good number seem to have been used for pedagogical purposes. When treated in ascending order of complexity, these reveal a "ground-level curriculum" which laid the literate foundation for the literary culture of Isidore and his friends.[32]

At the elementary stage, the simplest "educational slates" bear random letters in dispersed arrangement; others have partial or whole alphabets, comparable to papyri, tablets, and ostraca employed in Roman and late antique Egyptian teaching contexts for writing practice.[33] After this preparation, students progressed to whole words and phrases: one slate preserves a single word marked out between rubrics, recalling examples from Egypt where an instructor wrote a set sentence or phrase and pupils transcribed it within guidelines.[34] Another has various declined forms of dominus and domina, while on a third the same clause, suscepimus per castros ("we have received [X amount] through the fortified settlements"), is repeated at least six times, clearly attesting a process of learning by rote (to some, however, the latter is an obvious instance of tax collection in progress).[35] At a more advanced level, students copied out Scriptural and liturgical passages, typically from the Psalter—a standard "textbook" for the medieval classroom—in its distinctive Visigothic-Mozarabic tradition: while not of Iberian origin, the 6th-century Rule of the Master treats learning letters and studying the Psalms and canticles in just such conjunction, and the prescribed method of transcription and memorisation could account for the errors and omissions in these epigraphic extracts.[36] Abbreviations for "antiphonal" and "responsory" are also to be found on one slate, indicating that a liturgical manuscript was to hand, and the correction of mistakes made in copying certain words does suggest a teaching context, much like what seems to be an arithmetic exercise on a similar slate.[37] After practising letters, words, and sentences, students were finally drilled in composition: classicising moral epistles consisting of passages drawn from Scripture and the Distichs of Cato, another common late antique primer, or official correspondence prepared to template in suitably more ornate script.[38] One such royal petition addressed to Reccared is even partially repeated several times, as if the writer were struggling to master some of its forms, while on the reverse side we read the opening of a letter to a lord by a second hand; the slate was a "workbook" shared between two advanced pupils, learning to compose the texts clearly central to daily life by assembling portfolios of drafts.[39]

So, who were these students, and who were their teachers? For most of us, the Dark Ages have given way to a repackaged and rebranded late antiquity and early Middle Ages of bracing sociocultural originality and complexity.[40] But one tenacious element of the old paradigm is a conceptual division between the laity and the clergy, the latter still so easy to treat without really being aware of it as canny manipulators of a restricted "temple literacy."[41] Yet in a world before surplus and security, especially in the countryside, both shared the same everyday concerns, and we should be wary of erecting boundaries between them unless the sources dictate that we do so. In the case of the slates, there is little evidence to justify setting any limit on who could have been their writers, readers, or users otherwise. Social status was not a determining factor: slate records of land management were drawn up by peasant administrators and proprietors alike, equally able at least to jot down an aide-mémoire or two in the course of discharging their responsibilities.[42] Social order, similarly, does not appear to have been a constraint: personal titles are vanishingly rare, and even the few slate charters naming fratres in their address clauses may not mean ecclesiastics, since the label was also part of a simple honorific for laymen in the contemporary lexicon.[43] Most revealing of all is the fact that at least one document (perhaps two) is a holograph, a practice envisioned and sanctioned by Visigothic law, so long as appropriate form was observed and witnesses were present.[44] Here on the northern Meseta, drawing up legal papers

(stones) by oneself or with help as needed was a matter of course, facilitated by a free writing medium and the availability of models; local society participated in a common tradition inherited from the late Roman world, of creating charters at personal initiative to secure rights to property and manage the settlement of disputes.[45]

Both the medium itself, which offers a high degree of friction at the moment of inscription, and the broken and abraded condition of the exemplars combine to render palaeographic analysis an undertaking advisable for only the stoutest of heart.[46] With all due allowance for the decidedly tentative quality of any judgements, just four hands each of which has written more than one slate can be identified, yielding a minimum number of 158 writers in the corpus, not even counting slates with multiple hands or autograph signatures.[47] To think of these writers as "scribes" would be otiose. Such a total must reflect ad hoc literacy—basic, individual—on the part of those who kept notes and records, managed land, engaged in business, looked to the law, taught, learned, and prayed; most hands, with but one text each surviving to their credit, look no less practised for it.[48] Charter subscriptions too demonstrate a similar degree of comfort with writing amongst not only granters and beneficiaries, but also witnesses or "secondary participants": in all, there are 31 autograph signatures on the 10 (tolerably) legible slates, with a range of accompanying formulae directly comparable to the handful of parchment charters preserved from the period.[49] And in one document recording the terms of a sworn oath, the six presiding judicial figures appended their own subscriptions: in doing so they complied with Visigothic legislation, which required autographs of them in such contexts.[50] Instruction in the basics of literacy cannot have been rare; there are just three instances of a witness leaving a cross in lieu of a signature, and even so this counted legally to validate a contract, the same as one could either read the text oneself or else hear it read aloud before validating it.[51] Clearly there was a sizeable literate population on the rural northern Meseta, but it was a subset of a larger group for whom written modes, at some remove, were an ordinary aspect of living and interacting.

How do we account for the lack of corresponding evidence, be it textual or material, of episcopal, monastic, or other ecclesiastical school structures?[52] The "institutional approach" to literacy, focussing on formal venues of education, is something of a false start, in that there are always other ways and means of teaching, particularly when practical rather than specialised knowledge is involved.[53] Think of the types of writing on the slates: locals hardly needed the guidance of bishops assembled in pomp at Toledo to appreciate the utility of acquiring skills embedded in the pragmatics of daily life.[54] We simply want a mechanism for their dissemination. Conveniently enough, from the adjacent Bierzo, the idiosyncratic autobiographical writings of Valerius (*fl. c.*700)—a "crazed ascetic," "sour, self-righteous, ungrateful, and paranoid," or "a monk with an attractive personality" but "a tormented mind," depending on whom you ask—sketch for us a picture of how rural education operated without school walls.[55] We find him in the fastness of his mountaintop hermitage, where he "was rearing a certain child of good parents, and had composed a special booklet for his instruction"; as payment he asked only for some clothing. Absent any indication that the boy was bound for the clergy, this describes a barter economy in which Valerius, for the necessities to sustain his cantankerous solitude, supplied the teaching sought by rural folk, and not only those "of good parents": "yes, in the calm season, many young lads used to arrive, who likewise bound themselves over to my tutelage," remaining until the school year ended with the onset of winter.[56] On another occasion, when our hermit "was introducing a young pupil to letters," he specifically followed a curriculum of reading, memorising, and reciting "the whole Psalter together with the canticles," while he also compiled copies of liturgical texts himself, intending them for study as well as use, all practices tallying neatly with the slates.[57]

The find-sites of the pizarras imply that teaching and learning took place on the ground, far from the city and the school, on the estates and in the villages where the peasantry worked and lived. At one point Valerius exchanged his own bad-tempered, ill-mannered company for residence in a church on the property of a sympathetic landowner, and notwithstanding the predictable falling-out (ending, to his evident satisfaction, in the death of his erstwhile patron) we can begin on this basis to reconstruct a rural education system staffed by itinerant literates, agents of capillary diffusion who enabled the rustici to attain what literacy they needed via informal person-to-person exchange.[58] And not only the basics: besides his Scriptural and liturgical reading, the troubled holy man of the Bierzo had a working familiarity with Visigothic law, drawing on it to structure and inform his misery memoirs; this makes him a possible conduit too for the knowledge of legal norms evident in the slate charters.[59] The point is that such figures, anonymous in the main and integrated into local society, were marketing a set of skills in demand, responding to a rural population habituated to the employment of writing (and counting) in day-to-day life. Together the humble slates and these all but unknown teachers are the bridge from the Roman world to the age of Isidore, spanning the intervening chasm of higher literature and laying a broad foundation for Visigothic letters. At the Swiss monastery of Sankt Gallen, the monks provided literate services to surrounding lay communities accustomed since time out of mind to doing business in writing; so too was literacy in early medieval Iberia a point of contact between the clergy and the laity.[60] When we try to make sense of Isidore, we must fix our eyes on this horizon of expectation and education, an unbroken link with the antiquity which he sought through his work not to contact or rescue but rather to condense and reframe.

2. The Quiet Sevillano

Who, then, was Isidore, and what was he for? Like the many “mute and reticent graves” confronting Prudentius abroad in the catacombs of Rome, a private silence stymies enquiry into the man and his motives.[61] This obtains even in his correspondence, the special genre which can so easily beguile us into believing that we really know the author despite the constant interplay between personal testament and public performance.[62] The great man of letters, in point of fact, wrote very few, that is to say, only a dozen survive: six addressed to Braulio of Zaragoza—one of them also “re-gifted” to Sisebut—and a seventh to Bishop Helladius of Toledo. The other five are generally considered doubtful or spurious, if not for equally sound reasons: one each to Eugenius I of Toledo, Masona of Merida, and Leudefredus of Cordoba, bishops all; one to Claudius, dux of Lusitania; and one to Redemptus, the deacon who subsequently sat Isidore’s death watch.[63] This modest haul is by no means confessional, but it is characterised by three abiding themes, of friendship maintained, books shared, and infirmity endured. While each in its own way is a common epistolary conceit, we may in the silhouette of the man projected just make out the form obscured. When the end came, Redemptus described “a body wearied by persistent sickness,” whose “compromised stomach rejected food”: Isidore rallied, however, to receive the sacrament of penance, and after primly dispersing the “hordes of women” closing in on his position made a final confession and took communion, dying in his cell four days later.[64] The model of Martin of Tours lurks in the background of this account, which also draws freely on Isidorian writings and the liturgy, yet insofar as it speaks to a recurrent complaint of his letters, one is tempted to accord it some credence.[65]

The persona of Isidore, whether public or private, is most clearly delineated in his exchanges with Braulio. The earliest two letters of the set date to roughly 619–21 and tell a conventional story of absent comrades checking in on each other as they swap reading material.[66] In the first, Isidore plays etymologically on their shared spirit (animus) and friendship (amicitia) by enclosing, actually or metaphorically, a ring (annulus) and a cloak (amictus); he also attaches a "quaternion of rules," normally assumed to be his own Rule for Monks but fitting the description of any of the collections of mixed monastic handbooks by then in common circulation.[67] In the second letter, Isidore reiterates a request made previously viva voce for "the sixth decade of Saint Augustine," referring to part of the Exposition of the Psalms, and sends what he calls a Booklet (Libellus) of Synonyms, again possibly but not positively his own work of that name, before asking Braulio to pray for his "infirmities of the flesh and failure of mind."[68] Such professions of inadequacy to the task are a topos of the humility mode in contemporary epistolary (and literary) discourse, though more usually limited to alleged mental shortcomings. Physical handicap brings to mind "grim Eugenius"(II) of Toledo and his "auto-epitaph" lamentations, but also Asser and his portrait of Alfred, the Anglo-Saxon king for whom suffering sickness was the crux of his mimesis of Job, spiritual self-fashioning as a ruler of pious patience.[69] Are these confessed frailties deployed to invite similar interpretation from the reader, or were they a reality of Isidore's life?

Alongside friendship maintained from afar, the motif of bodily incapacity recurs in the later correspondence, a trio of letters dating to 632/633. The first is more in the line of opera buffa: Isidore had just taken delivery of a note from Braulio when, summoned by the king as a matter of the utmost moment, he was forced to leave it with a servant; returning from the palace, he could locate neither the letter nor any of his other papers, leaving him no alternative but to ask his pen pal to get back in touch.[70] Seemingly a shameless name-dropper, Isidore reveals in his next missive that he is back in the majestic presence to preside at the Fourth Council of Toledo. En route, he had posted Braulio an unemended (inemendatum) copy of his Etymologies, amongst other codices, for emendation (ad emendandum), unable to do so himself "because of indisposition"; in closing he adds that he has no news to relay about the turbulent bishop of Tarragona, reportedly involved in some ongoing sensation.[71] The third letter, addressed to either Braulio or Sisebut, was perhaps initially sent to the king, then repurposed after his death: it encloses a work (opus) "on the origin of certain things"—the Etymologies again in some version—"compiled from the recollection (recordatione) of old reading" and partially annotated.[72] What are we to make of the primacy accorded here to memory? It is distinctly unsettling in an encyclopaedist, whether or not he had index cards to fall back on in his research, and resembles the prefatory remark of another great gatherer and transmitter of sources, the Algerian intellectual al-Maqqarī (d. 1632): "we had nothing to assist us in our gigantic undertaking but what little still remained impressed on our mind and memory.…"[73] Is it a key to their shared methodology, or a caveat lector about the degree of fallibility to expect from the result of so great a labour? Isidore wrote to his distant friend and correspondent for the last time in 636, if one accepts the text as topical rather than generic, asking to see him once more before his death, or else in the life to come, and begging for Braulio's prayers in his autograph valediction.[74]

These six brief and diffident communications stand in sharp contrast to the five dubia et spuria, broadly more forthcoming the more certainly apocryphal. Isidore's letter to Eugenius has been judged suspicious on fairly flimsy grounds: some manuscripts identify the addressee as bishop of Toledo, and this Eugenius (I) was not consecrated until late February or early March 636, by which time Isidore had only a month to live (he died on 4 April).[75] I cannot see why he need therefore have given up on his inbox. Nor do the contents read as the work of a wily forger: in response to a query, Isidore clarifies that Peter has precedence over the other Apostles, deplores the Acephalite heresy in no uncertain terms, and reminds Eugenius that subscription to the Trinity is not an optional element of Christian faith.[76] The letter to Masona is considerably longer, and its stated date of 605/606 ("in the third year of the reign of our most glorious lord Witteric") has been taken as the sign of a forgery from later in the Visigothic period (his episcopate, and his life, concluded *c.*600), seeking to establish the superiority of Toledo over Merida. If so, obliquely; the text considers the honour of the repentant sinner, and vindicates the opinion of the Council of Ancyra (314) with Scriptural citations.[77] In a similar vein is the letter to Leudefredus, thought to be a product of cunning later 7th- or 8th-century Iberian priestcraft. What it amounts to is a (reasonably) brief dissertation on ecclesiastical offices and their duties, making appeal to the authority of both logic and antiquity, while drawing out the qualities expected of an abbot.[78] Great issues here, too, are not obviously at stake, but one can see why subsequent arrangements might handily be legitimised through retrospective ascription to the venerable padre. Quite a different matter is the letter to Claudius, addressing papal and episcopal powers, the Credo, and the need for caution with heretics, patently a forgery of the 9th century, the age of Pseudo-Isidore (no relation); the last, to Redemptus, on liturgical differences between West and East, with a postscript praising the Bible over the rules of grammarians, belongs to the debates of the 11th or 12th.[79] Both are entirely out of keeping with the terse observations of the authentic correspondence.

What little Isidore reveals of himself contains contradictions: a man battling disease for well over a decade to press on with his reading and writing; a man of affairs who drops everything to hit the road from Seville to Toledo and take his place at the king's right hand. The cottage industry of scholarship on his historical works settled long ago on a political interpretation, that he was brokering a traditio legis from Rome to the Catholic kingdom of the Visigoths, and this picture of a party academician has come to define Isidore in the round.[80] The problem is that, beyond what we have so far reviewed, there is virtually no evidence of his purported activism. He is a background presence at the Second Council of Seville in 619 and the Fourth Council of Toledo, the two fully documented meetings at which he was senior presiding prelate: no doubt one may trace his influence in the theological learning, concern for organisation and systematisation, and philosophy of Church and crown in cooperation present in the proceedings, but not through any overt, first-person intervention—Isidore remains, like all the other bishops, hidden behind the collective conciliar façade.[81] In this vacuum, something of a hybrid image has taken shape, the siglo de oro portrait painted by El Greco, austere and aloof, desiccated, the Grand Inquisitor of Don Carlo (Act 4, Scene 1), shuffling forth to insinuate policy into the sovereign ear, the negative to the positive of his extrovert brother Leander booming baptismal bons mots for the ages in 589.[82] Only one letter of Isidore, the seventh and last generally reckoned authentic (despite a late manuscript transmission), has him explicitly engaged with the world around him, discharging his pastoral responsibilities in the 620s or thereabouts. In clear and concise language, he asks Helladius "and the other prelates who are gathered with him" to depose the bishop of Cordoba, formerly a priest in Seville, for committing carnal sin, so that penitence in this life may earn forgiveness in the next.[83] Brief, and to the point. Silence may deceive, but it is past time at least to reappraise the quiet Isidore, alter ego to the politician and ideologue of our imagining. Whether we take his talk of malaise and memory as real or rhetorical struggle, by his own admission he was dedicated to his scholarly work before all else.

3. The Imperfectionist

Reserved and taciturn, Isidore had these further attributes: an inclination to revise and recraft his works continually, and a tendency to defer, cloaking and re-cloaking his own opinions in the authority of his stated sources, the secret security of the past. Even when he seems explicitly to be telling us something current and crucial—say, opining on the pronunciation of a word in his own day—he as often turns out to be channelling some fact or view culled from his omnivorous reading.[84] The point of departure for assessing the method behind the man is his catalogue raisonné: in life, Isidore had continued the index of Christian authors known generically as On Illustrious Men, and in death Braulio prepared a Listing (Renotatio) of the Books of Isidore by way of an appendix, enumerating and briefly describing "those works which have come to my attention." After heartily endorsing the eloquence and erudition of his subject, he presents 17 titles in all, crowned by the Etymologies, wherein "nearly everything which one ought to know" can be found; concluding in rapture on Isidore's articulacy and learning, he salutes his stewardship of the Second Council of Seville for definitively confuting the Acephalites, an argument in favour, perhaps, of the letter to Masona.[85] Much of the industrial output of Isidorian scholarship has sought to harness this review as a tool for identifying and interpreting his surviving œuvres, though disagreement remains over whether the treatises On Numbers and On Heresies latterly edited and published under his name are genuinely those cited here.[86] The order of presentation has even been mobilised as a sequential guide to relative date of composition—controversially so (and almost certainly without merit).[87] But the most interesting point is the one least often made. The Listing offers poor guidance in regard to the salient textual feature of Isidore's various works: the multiple extant versions attributable to their author.[88]

Letters, as before, provide a way in. The correspondence between the two bishops is transmitted together with the Etymologies, prefixed as if in lieu of the absent preface.[89] Of the pair of letters sent by Braulio, the earlier (625/626) entreats Isidore for the book (liber) by that title, which he had asked him to write and has heard is now complete, as well as for the proceedings of a council condemning Sintharius, "cooked to well done by the white heat of your interrogation."[90] The later (632/633), however, notes that seven years have elapsed since he placed his order for the books (libri) of Origins, a new title; in the meantime, he has been fobbed off with diverse and subtle delays, claims that they are unfinished, even unwritten, that his letter got lost in the mail. Increasingly desperate, Braulio demands his advance copy, reading Isidore the Riot Act for depriving him of love and friendship. At last, the jabbing finger: he has learned that many others are already in possession of the books (libri) of Etymologies, albeit "mutilated and chewed up"; he longs, how he longs, to hold them in his hands, but preferably "transcribed completely, emended, and properly integrated."[91] These earnest, if embarrassing, missives are the first sign that the great dictionary-encyclopaedia may have been composed and circulated not in continuous fascicles so much as in a number of distinct volumes, and that Isidore only conceived the idea of uniting them at a late stage in their production. As Braulio himself records, when the text in toto was finally entrusted to him for revision and dissemination, it was he who divided it into the twenty books of its present form.[92]

This editorial intervention bound together materials with separate geneses and purposes: Isidore's own Etymologies were not as we have them.[93] How, then? Beginning at the beginning, the first three books define the seven liberal arts, a manual not unlike the Secular Institutes of Cassiodorus, with an additional book on medicine.[94] Book five profiles civic and religious life by way of law, history, the Bible, canon law, and liturgical practice; books six through ten build on this foundation, discussing the Christian community in the form of God and his ministers, the structure of the Church and the nature of other religions, society and the family, and individuals and the labels for them. What now constitute books one to ten, in other words, offer the reader first an intellectual preparation, then a guide to the notional components of life, and in conclusion concrete information for participating in it, the balance firmly in favour of a Christian orientation. The second half of the Etymologies is a more straightforward gazetteer of the physical features of the world: man and animals, the four elements, geography, cities and buildings, precious stones and produce, social systems, and objects public and domestic. What accounts for this disjuncture of content and style? Book five closes with a brief chronicle of the six ages of man, conventionally called the Lesser Chronicle, and the manuscripts transmit its final entry in three versions, dating respectively to 623, 627, and 637.[95] This transparently suggests successive recensions, the third and last from a year after the death of Isidore, plausibly part of the editorial "completion" by Braulio; as is implicit in the earlier and explicit in the later of his pleading letters, copies of the text(s) seem to have circulated widely at the various stages of revision from quite early on. Importantly, book ten also has two overlapping prefaces, the second an elaboration of the first. The first is more bridging in nature ("we have inserted a certain number [of etymologies] in this work for the sake of learning"), and we may take it as introducing the final section of an initial ten-book format of the "whole" text, conceivably inscribed to Sisebut with that letter later reused for Braulio.[96] Assembled out of independent blocs, some of which circulated on their own (such as books five and perhaps ten), it was finished around 625/626, when Braulio first wrote enquiring after it. Isidore thereafter developed plans to expand his work, and composed or compiled what has become its second half, books eleven to twenty, in the years up to 632/633, when Braulio got wind of its availability (to others).

For Isidore the creative process was iterative and recursive: frequent dissemination of drafts amongst his peers, even if not always to his biggest fan, and regular revision or wholesale reconception. These practices are most clearly in evidence with his Greater Chronicle and Histories of the Goths, Vandals, and Sueves. The fearsome transmission of the former, in its full complexity, "cannot be mastered—can scarcely be approached—without an effort," but it is basically reducible to two versions, according to the date of the last entry: one in 615/616, during the reign of Sisebut, the other in 626, under Suinthila, a longer recension with new notices as well as deletions and modifications.[97] Isidore must have returned to update his earlier work for the new regime, as Suinthila, enterprisingly, had suppressed the son and successor of Sisebut to mount the Toledan throne. Yet there is also an intermediate family of manuscripts with features of both versions: he seems to have produced and circulated copies at various stages of composition, and indeed reused one such recension as the Lesser Chronicle in book five of the Etymologies (this too, as above, he rewrote).[98] The Histories have a similar story. Based once again on the final entry in the surviving manuscripts, we can identify two successive versions of the text: Isidore completed the first in 621, then dusted it off in 626, prosecuting "Our Peninsular Story" further in time and adding a laudatory preface and conclusion to celebrate the glorious expulsion of the east Romans.[99] He may also have bundled this second edition together with his Greater Chronicle, though copyists subsequently (and forgivably) jumbled up the different recensions. Heroic work disentangling the transmission has likewise brought to light a transitional form of the Histories, put in circulation from the scriptorium of Isidore himself before he had finalised his editorial interventions, and to be found in the same manuscripts as the intermediate Greater Chronicle, implying that he was amending the two texts in tandem.[100] The remarkable tradition of his historical writings unmistakeably conjures a particular Isidore, pen constantly in hand, revising his work to ensure that it remained current in content and outlook.

Maybe we should expect this in the production of something so massive as the Etymologies, and so sensitive as chronicling the political vicissitudes of the day. But the same iteration and recursion are apparent in his other more modest, less topical efforts. Consider the Synonyms, an essay in the language of spiritual contemplation: it is transmitted in two major families of manuscripts with differences sufficient to reconstruct two recensions, notably a pair of contrasting prologues (one posthumous: "Isidore of holy remembrance") in addition to the prefatory letter.[101] While the text as a unity has variously been dated to post-595, *c.*604–12, and 631, a plausible scenario building on what we have seen is that Isidore shared a first draft with Braulio (enclosing it with his letter of 619–21), which became the basis of one surviving version, then edited his own working copy into the other at some point thereafter; the precise circumstances are still very much in debate.[102] Or take the Allegories, explanatory notices on the moral sense of the principal personages of the Bible perhaps for use by preachers, drawing on Patristic—especially Augustinian—citations.[103] We still lack a published critical edition, forcing us back to the volumes of the Patrologia Latina ("repellent though they are in appearance"), but preliminary study points strongly once more towards two recensions: here the modifications are comparatively slight, confined mainly to organisation; even so, only one branch of the manuscripts bears the cover letter to Orosius (surely Aurasius, bishop of Toledo?), in which Isidore "commended these [notes] to your judgement for correction," putting us back amidst circulating drafts and authorial proofs.[104] An exception to this pattern has in the past been found in the manual On Ecclesiastical Offices, a companion to the liturgy and hierarchy of the Church written at the request of Isidore's brother Fulgentius: its transmission seemed blissfully free of notable discrepancies.[105] Recent work, however, has flagged variants hitherto attributed to contamination, friend or foe to so many an editor, which may instead reflect stages of correction and revision.[106] This minor editorial activity is not on the scale of a new recension, but it does bring the text into line with general Isidorian practice, and may provide a context for its division into two books and arrangement into chapters.

Why write and rewrite? The shape of an answer can be glimpsed in the textual history of On the Nature of Things, an almanac prepared by Isidore with some encouragement from Sisebut and probably complete as of 612/613. The treatise is transmitted in three recensions: shorter, comprising 46 chapters; intermediate, appending what is now numbered chapter 48; and longer, incorporating chapter 44 as well as (for the most part) the so-called "mystical addition," which disappointingly just explicates how the day is "the image of the Law"; this last, if not Iberian in origin, may be a later contribution by Northumbrian eruditi.[107] The evidence admits of more than one interpretation, but Isidore most likely added chapter 48 himself, after reading book two of Pliny the Elder's Natural History, to emulate the ending of that rival forerunner with his own considered views "On the Parts of the Earth." This chapter also has many points of contact with book fourteen of the Etymologies, "On the Earth," suggesting that, a decade or so after finishing On the Nature of Things, he revisited it while engaged in his dictionary project.[108] We thereby begin to see Isidore in sharper relief: not only revising his current work as he learned of new sources, but also editing one text in light of material culled from research for another—an author continually emending, updating, and reconciling the whole corpus of his output, maintaining its consistency on the fly, not waiting for autumnal retractationes. In this connexion, it is worth contemplating his Questions on the Old Testament, an exegesis of the Pentateuch and the Histories thought to date from early in his publishing career.[109] The preface promises the reader comprehensive literal and allegorical analyses, agreeing with Braulio's description of the work as divided into two books, but the second is not identifiably extant, while in the first the much greater length of the initial five literal commentaries does make it look like Isidore simply lost interest in the rest; it is almost certainly unfinished. Yet there are alternatives to ennui: book two may survive (in summary form) as the Allegories, and he could still have been preparing the remainder of his planned essays at the time of his death.[110] Based on our knowledge of his working habits, what we have may be a series of drafts and outlines which he handed out to his colleagues, soliciting their comments and corrections—in future a complete critical edition should tell.

Textual flux is a hallmark of the entire Isidorian bibliography. At some point in the years between 612 and 614/615, he composed On the Catholic Faith against the Jews, offering robust refutation, "original in his formulations," of the errors of Judaism for the enlightenment of his sister Florentina.[111] Exploratory study of its transmission has revealed signal divergences amongst the few manuscripts collated: could they too reflect authorial revision? Isidore had first put calamus to parchment in the reign of Sisebut and the circumstance of his anti-Semitic activities; later and with political cover, he distanced himself from such initiatives in his edited Histories, and we may hope that here he was further developing his preference for persuasion over forced conversion, though his apparent actions at the much controverted "Third" Council of Seville (622–24?) do cast doubt on the moderation of his position.[112] Another question in this line arises with On Differences: the Isidorian tracts "On the Differences of Words" and "On the Differences of Things" are more often transmitted apart than together, and while Braulio catalogues them as comprising two books, summarised in a description drawn from the prologue to the former, Isidore may have written the latter first.[113] No early manuscripts preserve both books copied in what is now thought of as their "correct" order, and when copied together each has undergone noteworthy modification. Book one is the first surviving example of a genre, orthographic lexicography, in which synonyms and homonyms are stated, defined, and distinguished by phonetics, morphology, or semantics as appropriate. Isidore had arranged it thematically, but quite soon in its transmission it was alphabetised and expanded. Book two is much shorter and treats broadly spiritual content, from the mystery of the Trinity to the parts of the body, via grammatical distinctions. Similarly, the text was quickly revised and reorganised, with paragraphs and whole chapters added or excised, but none of this by Isidore, at least not for certain.[114] The manuscripts indicate that the two books initially circulated independently, and perhaps this reflects their composition: could it have been Braulio who combined them, even as he laid out the Etymologies, following the example of the author in packaging and repackaging his work?

The bishop of Zaragoza would not have been alone in interpreting his role as Isidore's literary executor expansively. While the sage of Seville has not quite achieved the distinction of certain recording artists in releasing more studio albums dead than alive, expansion post mortem has been the fate of much of his corpus, after his own example but also conceivably owing to its predominantly impersonal "reference" quality. Early in his career, Isidore compiled his On Illustrious Men, schematic profiles of Christian writers following on from Jerome and Gennadius, in 33 chapters: as above, this original subsequently acquired Braulio's catalogue for an appendix, and underwent a number of revisions, before being transformed into a second version of 46 chapters, complete with prologue, probably in Iberia at some point later in the 7th century.[115] One can readily see why an authoritative bibliography defining a canon invited modification to taste. But something similar befell the Sentences: the key source for Christian political philosophy in Visigothic Iberia and the most copied of Isidore's works after the Etymologies, it gained a whole new fourth book, though not until long after its frustratingly uncertain date of composition.[116] Still more significant are the transformations of another youthful effort, On the Birth and Death of the Fathers, succinct biographical notices (birth, life, death, burial) of the stars of sacred history. The text survives as both a single unit and divided piecemeal, offering introductions to individual books of the Bible, but only the coherent format is definitely Isidorian; here too chapters were added steadily over time to redress gaps in coverage—the Lesser Prophets to name one shocking omission—while the content was updated to suit new understandings of Scripture.[117] Perhaps from conception, or else very soon in its transmission, the work was assembled into a kind of Sunday School primer together with the Allegories and the Prefaces, the last a set of forty summaries and brief comments on the authorship and reception of biblical books. Like its partner, it too was carved up and distributed as introductory material; first steps towards a much-needed modern edition have revealed several stages of post-Isidorian tinkering, the addition of new content, and a systematic revision of the entire opus which may emanate from the Carolingian court.[118]

In life and death the writings of Isidore were mutable, subject to reconciliation with each other or the latest progressive thinking. The final work securely ascribable to him, his Rule for Monks, confirms this picture. The text still has no critical edition in the generally accepted sense of the term, and the manuscripts have yet to be catalogued, let alone collated, but it appears to survive in two recensions. The first reflects the monastic observance which Isidore had laid down by 620 or so, while in the second a series of chapters have been altered to prescribe greater disciplinary rigour; dateable to the mid-7th century, this later version reflects the undeniably more severe monasticism favoured by Fructuosus of Braga and his circle—the original, in other words, has been brought into line with changing fashions.[119] Such transformative transmission, recalling the successive, evolving editions of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, may also elucidate how we should handle a remark made by Braulio at the close of his Isidorian inventory: "there are many other minor works too by this man, and in the Church of God instruments with much elaboration."[120] The second half conjures the compilation of conciliar acts known as the Hispana, more or less now agreed in its earliest form to be Isidore's creation, illustrated with canonical tables of reference; the afterlife of this collection proved long and changing.[121] As to the first half, at least forty texts have been ascribed over the years to "this man" only to be reckoned dubious or spurious, including on the grounds that they are mere sets of extracts from his genuine writings.[122] One wonders whether some of them may turn out, when reread with greater sensitivity to persona and practice, to be authorial drafts or versions, prepared for other audiences and contexts, further signs of a writer ever in search of the fullest, most perfect expression of knowledge.

4. The Harmless Drudge

Where, then, did that perfection lie? One striking feature of his publications is that many open in medias res, with nary a word as to scope or objective.[123] The Etymologies has only this laconic note above the table of contents: “So that you may readily find what you are seeking after in this work, this page reveals to you, reader, what topics the author of this volume treats in its constituent books.”[124] Absent from many of the manuscripts, clearly this was not written by Isidore himself, and in any case it describes the function of the table of contents rather than the purpose of the text. Of course, one may call a point of order that, since his magnum opus was unfinished at the time of his death, we should not expect a preface. Yet the same is true of the Sentences, theologically and philosophically the most influential of his output: no prolegomena at all, and indeed Braulio characterises it as a simple florilegium distilled from Gregory the Great’s Morals on Job, as if it made no argument of its own, rather than being a fundamental exposition of inter alia the proper relationship between king and conventicle.[125] Further in this vein is On Illustrious Men, which launches without fanfare. It is possible to maintain that, because this work picks up from Jerome and Gennadius and was typically transmitted in direct continuation to them, a prologue would have been superfluous, already provided at the head of the former’s catalogue. But only implicitly is orthodoxy established as its key concern, through the opening hatchet job on Osius of Cordoba.[126] Isidore’s authorial persona called for deliberate concealment from the reader. The Histories, in seeming contrast, has a famously full foreword, “In Praise of Hispania,” detaching the land from its Roman history in order to create a space for the Visigoths as the legitimate new rulers of the Peninsula. Amidst the ripe paeans to its riqueza, however, "in which the glorious fecundity of the Getic people rejoices so and flourishes abundantly," one realises that all speech is in the second and third person, and Isidore is nowhere to be found, screened by this curiously sexualised passing of an age: "at long last the most thriving nation of the Goths, after many victories in the world, eagerly seized and loved you, and enjoys you up to the present, amidst royal insignia and lavish wealth, secure in the fortune of empire."[127]

Where there is first-person introduction, it tends to the familiar reticence, but Isidore does nonetheless let slip some hints of his priorities. The Greater Chronicle, unlike On Illustrious Men, begins by explicitly name-checking predecessors: Julius Africanus, "the first of us to produce a summary of the times according to generations and reigns, in the simple style of history," Eusebius, Jerome, "some guys," and Victor of Tunnuna. Isidore then states flatly, phrased slightly differently in his two versions of the text, "We have recorded, with as much brevity as possible, the sum of the ages from the Creation of the world to the rule [or eras] of Heraclius Augustus and Sisebut [or Suinthila] the king."[128] Three compositional principles emerge fleetingly: simplicity and economy of expression and completeness of coverage. Elsewhere even this limited steer is lacking. The prologue of sorts to the Prefaces really just enumerates "the fullness of the New and Old Testament which the Catholic Church has received in the canon according to the ancient tradition of our forefathers," and modestly concludes, "having set out the order and number of books of the Old and New Testaments, let us now swiftly and briefly prefix short narrative preambles to them."[129] Be comprehensive, be succinct; now get down to business. This modus operandi still more blatantly characterises the two major works of contested attribution to Isidore's stylus. The treatise On Numbers opens abruptly with a definition of terms, pausing only to note that "it has pleased me, as you requested, to convey concisely the rules of some numbers."[130] In like fashion, On Heresies starts by distinguishing amongst the orthodox, the heretic, and the schismatic, before undertaking to "note down as summarily as we can the blasphemies of their errors one by one, in order that the precaution of the faithful may be the readier when the secret ways of the impious—dark and rough—are exposed."[131] Brief, but complete; nothing more.

The four works with epistolary prefaces fortunately crack open the door a bit wider. In the Allegories, asking "Orosius" to improve on his writing, Isidore explains that, "briefly excerpted, I have hastily gathered some of the most noteworthy names from the Law and the Gospels which are figuratively concealed by allegory and want some interpretation, in order to render them plain and clear to readers," touching on two themes already encountered in his pithier introductions. Yet conciseness can compromise coverage, since it has "allowed me neither to produce enough for a booklet nor to explain thoroughly the mysteries of the figures," requiring fancy presentation: "my feeling was that they might be grasped from the citations which are situated both before and after them."[132] Isidore strikes a like note when dedicating On the Catholic Faith to Florentina, expressing hope that quoting "some few of the innumerable passages" from the Old Testament "may firm up the grace of faith and demonstrate the ignorance of the faithless Jews."[133] At the beginning of book two, on prophecy, he adds, "you will be able, from a few words, to ascertain how many words the voices of the Prophets have in rejection of the Jewish people and their ceremonies, and how many words they have thundered in praise of the people of the New Testament."[134] There is a pronounced sense of anxious synecdoche, the part for the whole: that Isidore was acutely aware of his limited compass when measured by the incomprehensible totality of Christian knowledge.

The most forthcoming prologue is the letter to Sisebut prefixed to On the Nature of Things: by royal invitation, "I have commented on all these matters in a short text, presenting them just as they were written about by the ancients, and especially in the literature of Catholic men," adding to the recurrent themes an appeal to past authority, pagan as well as orthodox. Isidore further promises to spell out "on certain contested points both their meanings and their words, so that the authority of those statements may inspire trust," downplaying his originality while signalling his essential role as interpreter for the reader through the juxtaposition of "meanings (sensus)" and "words (verba)."[135] Enclosing the treatise On Ecclesiastical Offices to his brother Fulgentius, he concedes that the work has been "annotated from the most ancient writings of authors, as space has allowed," before tacking on a similar rider that "I have put much in it of my own composition, and I have included other material just as it was in the sources, so that one's reading of the individual entries might more easily gain the authority of faith." How are we to take this? Consider his concluding statement: "forgiveness will be the more forthcoming for my errors because what draws from the testimony of writers is not to be assigned to the category of my fault."[136] All errors that remain, in other words, are not my own; citing ancient authorities, Isidore disguises his own contribution. The few words which immediately precede the text of books one and two proper lack any reference to his own input, replaced by appeal to Scripture, the Apostles, custom, and common usage.[137] Yet something of himself is undeniable in the work: he later laments how amateur lectors resent "those of us" who draw attention to their incompetent pronunciation.[138] It is Isidore the author who retreats from our view. But why?

The stakes are defined in the preface to On the Birth and Death of the Fathers: the notion of essential knowledge, the basics of Christian history, alongside the necessarily concise form of its communication. In Isidore's words, "the birth and deeds of certain holy and most noble men, together with their genealogies, are introduced in this booklet, besides which their worth and death and burial are recorded in the brief space of a sentence." The brief space: "although these may be known to all who make it through the bulk of the Scriptures, they nevertheless return more readily to the memory if they are read briefly expressed."[139] Brevity reconciles the Isidorian principle of universal coverage with the capacity of the reader to remember, crucial, as we have seen, to his own understanding and working method. The same theme returns in the prologue (by far the longest) to his Questions on the Old Testament, in which Isidore proposes to elucidate the allegorical meanings prefiguring Christianity: "gathering the opinions of the churchmen of old, like flowers from sundry meadows, we have put selections to hand." At the same time, he has condensed, "for succinct statements in brief exposition do not engender disdain by their prolixity; indeed, wordy and recondite eloquence wearies one, whereas short and simple delights." Underscoring the point, he adds, "drawing out these figures of deeds from the mystical treasuries of the wise, as we said above, we have collected them into one form by the abridgement of brevity; here the reader will not read our words, but re-read those of the ancients." Finally, he signs off with a roll call, of Origen, Victorinus, Ambrose, Jerome, Cassian, Augustine, Fulgentius, and above all Gregory the Great, his sources: "what I speak, they say, and my voice is their tongue."[140]

In his own eyes, Isidore was a simple transmitter, as an "author" actuated solely by a mission to make manageable, unobtrusively, that incomprehensible totality of Christian knowledge. How best to aid the reader in its digestion? Something of an answer is expressed in the preamble to his Rule for Monks, where Isidore observes, "there are a great many regulations or teachings of our ancestors to be found, enunciated here and there by the Holy Fathers; some of these have been handed down rather wordily or obscurely to posterity." From that unwieldy and inaccessible whole, "we have ventured to choose these few as examples for you, and to use rustic, common language for you to understand as easily as possible how to keep the vow of your profession." Selection and simplification: transmission, but a discreet originality of distillation and adaptation, for a new age: "he who has proven incapable of the challenging commands of the ancients should fix his step towards the discipline of this path, and be not disposed to turn away any longer."[141] The mission so stated, tension yet lingers between Isidore and his sources. Addressing the reader before book one of the Differences, he notes that "quite a few of the ancient authors have tried to distinguish differences in language, investigating something of the very subtle distinctions between some words and others," but alas, "owing to the needs of metre, pagan poets have confused the proper usage of language, and so from them the habit has derived of authors using a great many words indiscriminately." Critique of the classics? Acknowledging Cato (the Elder) as father of the genre, Isidore admits, "on his example I have, in part, put forth a very few distinctions of my own and, in part, produced them from books by other authors."[142] The sheer volume, the internal inconsistency, of what had to be distilled into memorable form made intervention unavoidable, but he remained uneasy—"a very few"—with shouldering that burden.

The Synonyms is unquestionably Isidore's most personal work, model for the "synonymous style" unfortunately adopted by some of his followers, and its oddly tripartite preface is relevant to this point. The first part, hyperbolic puff, is patently as above a later pious addition. In the second, Isidore himself says to the reader with disarming humility, "recently there came into my hands a certain book called Synonyms, the structure of which made up my mind to assemble some lamentation for myself, or for the miserable; doubtless I have followed not the style of that work, but my own whim."[143] Familiar sentiment, taken to another level: his own original composition, yet all credit for its fashioning deflected onto a superior exemplar, which those afflicted by the adversities of the world should really consult. One last Isidorian prologue can serve to canonise this discomfort with creation. The Hispana is preceded by a lengthy anonymous introduction describing the four major councils (Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon) and summarising the collection: the acts of the Greek and Latin councils and the decrees of the bishops of Rome, "gathered and arranged together by us from the discipline of the ecclesiastical order, that both the holy bishops may be instructed by paternal rules and the obedient ministers and people of the Church may be imbued with spiritual examples." These remarks end characteristically on a note of etymology:

> "canon" in Greek is called "rule" in Latin. It is called "rule" because it directs rightly, nor does it ever lead in the other direction; some say that it is called "rule" since it rules or because it reveals a norm of living rightly, or because it corrects what is distorted and evil.[144]

That act of compilation was perhaps the most important legacy of Isidore besides the Etymologies, selecting and transmitting such canons as would guide Church practice in the West for centuries, and he performed it from behind the screen of anonymity.

The work which went into such compilation is on full view in Isidore's On Illustrious Men, a guide to his reading in which he also offers the most sustained exposition of his views on composition. One distinguishing feature is his refusal to comment on texts which he has not read: he leaves a definite impression of learning in progress, in perfect alignment with his continual revising, an author acutely aware that he had not read everything, equally conscious of the imperative to do so.[145] And for practical ends; most of the surviving works cited here can be readily identified put to use in his other writings.[146] Isidore records in his notes on Martin of Braga, “I have indeed read one book of his on the distinctions of the four virtues,” while he confesses in regard to Licinianus of Cartagena that “we have certainly read not a few of his letters … but the remaining yield of his industry and labour has totally failed to come to our notice.”[147] Conscientious in bibliography, sensitive to the limits of his research: respecting a tract on virginity by Severus of Malaga, “frankly, we admit that we have learned of its title yet are ignorant of the contents,” and he signs off his notices for both Apringius of Beja and John of Vallclara by recording that they too wrote sundry other works which have not come to his attention.[148] Partly it was a question of honesty. In profiling Justus of Urgell, he minutes, “his brothers Nebridius and Elpidius are reported to have written some works, but because we are unfamiliar with them we recognise that they must be left unspoken.”[149] At the same time, it was also an aspect of Isidore’s Sisyphean task, the quest for true, literal comprehension: on Maximus of Zaragoza, he concludes that “he is also said to have written many other works—I have not read these yet.”[150]

The goal of reading everything was a source of palpable anxiety. One could take as commonplace Isidore’s remarks on John Chrysostom: “he composed many and varied tractates, quite excessively long to enumerate, and indeed, although not the full measure of his zeal, nevertheless as many effusions of his eloquence as possible have been translated from Greek into Latin.”[151] There is a real (and relatable) note of despair, however, in his reaction to Possidonius and the bibliography of Augustine, “cataloguing how many works the same most blessed doctor has written, totalling volumes of over 400 books, but an infinite series of homilies, letters, and enquiries as well, such that nigh scarcely can anyone write by hand as many more works as he composed by his own effort.”[152] An opportunity was the most one could ask: Isidore concedes with regard to Fulgentius of Ruspe, “we have only plucked these from the precious flowers of his teaching; his is a better lot to whom the Lord has lent the delights of all his books.”[153] And how much truer of Gregory the Great: in the 35 volumes of his Morals on Job, “so many mysteries of the sacraments are revealed, so many teachings of morals are commanded unto love of the eternal life, and so many ornaments of words shine brightly, that no wise man will be able to explain, even if all his limbs should be turned into a tongue." Reviewing all the works of the servus servorum Dei, Isidore reaches the Homilies on the Gospels, "unknown to us; but happy, nay all too happy, he who has been able to know all the statements of his efforts."[154] So saying, he moves to his next subject.

In the face of so much still to read, Isidore prioritised brevitas in his own style, to the enduring frustration of all those who have looked for answers in his Histories ("unworthy of the famous savant who wrote it. He could hardly have told us less, except by not writing at all").[155] He also promoted it in the work of others. Paulinus of Nola is commended for a short book on the blessings of the patriarchs, "composed with succinct enough brevity," while Eugippius merits approval for the Life of Severinus, "communicated in a brief style."[156] But Isidore's attitude is more complex than a simple preference for telegraphic prose. He writes in praise of John the Cappadocian: "this man published in Greek a rescript on the sacrament of baptism to Bishop Leander, my lord of blessed memory and my predecessor, in which he puts nothing of his own, but only replicates the views of the Fathers of old on triple immersion."[157] Transmission trumps innovation, yet with Apringius of Beja he allows that his interpretation of the Apocalypse is "nearly better than the ancient churchmen seem to have expounded."[158] Nearly—and actually so in the person of Gregory the Great alone, "through the grace of the Holy Spirit gifted with such a light of knowledge that no learned man not only of present times, but also even in past times, was ever equal to him."[159] Through a miraculous wisdom one might match or even surpass those who had gone before; on the whole, though, it would be better to err on the side of caution, repeating or at most rewording.

Originality nonetheless had a certain role to play. Writing of Proba, authoress of a cento on the life of Christ composed in Virgilian metre, Isidore says, "we do not admire her effort, but we do praise her cleverness," fidelity to a sound model combined with rather more suitable subject matter.[160] Note that the exemplar for her "almost diabolical ingenuity," however, was a pagan poet.[161] Surprised? Many have remarked on the warmth of Isidore towards his brother Leander, profiled amongst these other celebrated men. Characteristically it is only here, by proxy, that he reveals the family history of flight from "Byzantine" Spain. Yet lukewarm would be more accurate: "for the rest of his fellow bishops he likewise issued a great many familiar letters, if not in overly beautiful words, at least acute in their opinions."[162] What style guide, then, was he following? Isidore articulates his sensibility in a paragraph on Eucherius, author of a minor work in celebration of the desert, "dictated most brilliantly and in sweet speech; we praise the doctor for this work, even though he nevertheless utters few beautiful words in it." Following the lead of Jerome before him, he consults Cicero (anonymously) to clarify: "for brevity, as the man says, is at times praiseworthy in one or another aspect of speaking, but it does not garner praise in all eloquence."[163] The beautiful before the brief, disciplined as by Proba, given freer rein than by Fulgentius or Eucherius. Isidore applied these criteria in his own practice, and Braulio tells us as much, for in counting his subject's 17 works, he departs from standard verbs of writing on three occasions: the Greater Chronicle, which he "collected (collectum)"; the Rule for Monks, which he "tempered (temperauit)"; and the Sentences, which he "embellished with choice selections (floribus … decorauit)" from the Morals on Job.[164] The work of a shaping hand—but how and with what purpose did Isidore decide amongst all the sources for potential transmission?

5. The Stacks of Heaven

"In him," Braulio meditated on his master and mentor, "Antiquity regained a certain something for itself—or rather, our day and age pictured the knowledge of Antiquity in him." Like a mirror; perhaps more like reinforced foundations, for "God raised him in this latter-day era after so many failures in Hispania, I believe, to restore the monuments of the ancients, lest we grow old in every conceivable kind of rusticity—as if to lend us a certain support."[165] To his contemporaries, Isidore had polished, or at least propped back up, the icon of the ancient world, and its civilisation. But was the newly visible image what the old one had been? Did he restore or reimagine it? Many of Isidore's works can be comfortably situated in established Christian genres: the Allegories, Prefaces, Questions on the Old Testament, and On the Birth and Death of the Fathers are all, as we have seen, standard exercises in modes of biblical exegesis, just as On the Catholic Faith draws from a long tradition of anti-Jewish polemic. On Illustrious Men picks up the baton from Jerome and Gennadius (and pagans prior to them), while the Rule for Monks bills itself explicitly as a distillation of its forerunners. On Ecclesiastical Offices is a manual in the line of Ambrose, whereas the Greater Chronicle and Histories look to Eusebius and Cassiodorus, and the Sentences reflects on Gregory the Great's thought. On Numbers and On Heresies, if authentically Isidorian, operate too within the familiar parameters of numerology and categorisation of doctrinal error. This is not to say that there is no innovation here: to take one example, it has often been remarked that Isidore narrows the former universalism of On Illustrious Men to a distinctly North African and Iberian focus in his installment.[166] But such is hardly wholesale reinvention of the genre.

The transformative author hymned by Braulio begins to emerge in the lexicographical and encyclopaedic writings, where Isidore deliberately adopted hitherto pagan literary models in order to subordinate language and learning to a Christian epistemological framework.[167] The method behind the Differences would have been recognisable to Varro and Verrius Flaccus, founders of Latin lexicography; the novelty lies in the subject matter, or rather the adjoining of traditional linguistic enquiry to specifically Christian spiritual concerns.[168] The Synonyms pursues these concerns a step farther, yet still casts them in the archetypical mode of classical philosophy: a dialogue, between Man and Reason, about askesis and the fate of the sinful soul.[169] In both cases, Isidore was consciously redirecting an ancient genre to a new Christian purpose: not simply a silent compiler and condenser, he was a discreet and discriminating bridge-builder between the two traditions. Where this project assumes universal dimensions is in his On the Nature of Things, drawing inspiration from Pliny the Elder, and above all in his Etymologies. The North African connexion again: the closest model for the latter is the 5th-century encyclopaedia by the pagan Martianus Capella, On the Marriage of Philology and Mercury, a summary of the "seven disciplines" or liberal arts, the same taxonomy with which Isidore commenced his endeavour.[170] In a sense, all his other writings can be understood as preparatory studies to this vast compilation, which in merging pagan source material with a Christian cosmology effectively re-homed the one in the other.[171] Isidore was reframing knowledge itself: insofar as all knowledge was now to be found inside the covers of his great book, it was all Christianised knowledge; the seeming anachronism is not an anomaly but organic to his purpose, to reach back into antiquity and bring it forward from the pagan past into the Christian present, to create a poetics of Christianised antiquity, to preserve the synthesis for the memory of the future.[172] The first distinctively Christian etymological encyclopaedia, all the fragments of remembered reading laid out within it formed a card catalogue for the library of God.

One of the enduring interests of Isidorian research has been his own library at Seville. If we could only get hold of a reader's pass and rootle amongst its well-stocked shelves, surely then we would know him.[173] What we do have is 27 poems in elegiac distichs, preserved under his name and offering a guide to those holdings. They have seldom been tapped in this or any regard: perhaps because of lingering doubts about their authorship—queried authenticity is as close as academia has to a "no entry" sign.[174] Now that the question seems all but settled, what are they, and what can they teach us?[175] The first poem is entitled "legend (titulus) of the library (bibliothecae)": traditionally it and the 14 which follow have been read as inscriptions on the bookcases or boxes where the codices of the episcopal library were held. Based on their respective headings, the next three poems are in like manner thought to have decorated the infirmary, the half-dozen thereafter the pharmacy, and the last three the all-important scriptorium. The poems on Gregory the Great and Leander seem to treat them as deceased; if recently so, composition would date to the first decade of the 7th century. But that is guesswork. The run of verses, as will probably not stun you, survives in two recensions: a shorter, of 15, and a longer, of 24, transmitted at times with the Questions on the Old Testament, though in truth selection and ordering vary greatly amongst the manuscripts.[176] According to their most recent editor, Isidore himself picked the poems in the shorter recension and posted them to a Galician monastery, where they became associated with works by Martin of Braga, a hallmark of the transmission history. Back in Seville, a disciple of the maestro later copied 24 of the poems off the walls, missing out what are now the last three, and thereby created the longer recension. The latter, however, is not only the more complete, but also the more metrically correct. The simplest reconstruction of the manuscript evidence is that Isidore wrote 27 poems as a set, which he then joined to his Questions on the Old Testament, and a mutilated copy of this is the ancestor of the longer recension: he is rather more likely to have packaged his verses together with his own work, and this is the version subsequently known by Visigothic and Mozarabic authors, hence probably the closer to the archetype (if there was just one). The shorter recension, on the other hand, descends via corrupt transcription from the work of a 7th-century Galician monk, who made his own selection, rearranging and repackaging the poems according to his interests, in the long Isidorian tradition of dynamic transmission.

The reader is invited to peruse the library and learn. Imagining a brother who says smugly, "there is nothing left for me to study" after the Histories and the Law, Isidore replies, "if you say so now, then you really understand nothing."[177] But hold a moment: is this bibliotheca simply a library in Seville, or is it actually the Library—the Bible itself? The term was ambiguous in late antiquity and the early Middle Ages; binding these poems together with the exegetical Questions starts to make sense if we take them to be arguing for a programme of reading in which Scripture has absolute precedence. In the next generation, Eugenius (II) of Toledo certainly thought so: writing his own bibliotheca verses, he drew directly on Isidore's language to describe the books of the Bible, a prestige copy of which his small success once adorned.[178] Perhaps we need to accept a deliberate slippage of meaning, collapsing the distinction between library and Library. The second poem, after all, adds a further note of caution, contrasting the mundane with the sacred: there are "meadows full of thorns but abundant in flowers," such that "if you do not wish to grasp thorns, pick the roses."[179] This is not immediately explained, leaving the reader primed with anticipation. The poet then moves to "the venerable volumes of the twin Law," here unambiguously the Bible ("the New with the Old"), before turning back to Origen and the looming danger: sapient, prolific, "I was ruined by a guilty tongue … my On Principles alone led to my fall."[180] Be careful. Alternating opposites, we regain the light with Hilary of Poitiers, "thundering of voice," and Ambrose of Milan, "distinguished in signs and hymns."[181] Gradually the message resolves itself: in reading lies potential salvation as well as damnation.

Isidore picks up a familiar theme when he reaches Augustine: "he who confesses to have read you lies," for in reality, "what reader can own all your works?" He of Hippo and his thousand volumes bear witness that, though wisdom may come from many, "if Augustine is to hand, he alone suffices for you."[182] In rapid hit parade, Jerome, "a most learned interpreter in various languages," John Chrysostom, "celebrated as doctor everywhere" for his books, and Cyprian of Carthage, "more illustrious in eloquence than all," whizz by before at last we reach the heart of the matter.[183] Virgil, Horace, Ovid, and Persius are dreadful, begins one of the two longest poems; indeed, Lucan and Statius are objectionable. “Let sweet Prudentius appear with his exceptional voice,” therefore, or “read through the studious poem of fluent Avitus,” or even have a go at Juvencus and Sedulius, “both flowering with verses.”[184] The argument concerns individual poets less than the offensiveness of all classical verse in comparison with the sweetness of any Christian poetry. Lest he be misread, Isidore emphasises that the last pair, composers of biblical epics, “take long draughts from the Gospel font,” before looking the reader directly in the eye: “thus, desist from deferring to the pagan poets; when you drink such good things, what is Callirhoe to you?”[185] Frogmarching a naiad past, whose Greek name means “beautiful flow” (or “Lady Lovely Stream”), is typical etymological wordplay, but the moral of the story is now clear, a feeling shared by Christian intellectuals throughout late antiquity struggling with the need to make use of their classical inheritance: caution—danger ahead.[186]

Continuing our tour, Eusebius and Orosius share one (dull) bookcase, Gregory the Great shines forth as the patron of Rome like Augustine as the magister of Hippo, and Leander is “reckoned not wholly unequal to the ancient doctors.”[187] We then switch gears to Theodosius, Paul, and Gaius, emblematic of the real value of Roman law, “which governs the Latin forum with truthful voice.”[188] From his brother on they collectively personify Isidore’s abiding ambivalence about emulation, innovation, and precedent. This gallery of authors gives way to Cosmas, Damian, Hippocrates, and Galen, “whom medicine celebrates throughout the world,” neatly neutralising the medics of antiquity in balance with the twin brother physician-martyrs of early Christianity.[189] The first “medical poem” is usually taken as a section break, conducting us into the episcopal infirmary, but Hippocrates at least is also one authority whom Isidore name-checks in drawing up book four, “On Medicine,” of his Etymologies, while Galen is cited explicitly (though indirectly, via Jerome) in book twenty.[190] The next playfully urges the medic to be responsive to the patient lest he run out of business, and the third counsels him to attend to both “the pauper and the powerful,” profiting only from the latter—as if to ensure that medical practice is justly animated by Christian charity.[191] The following poem, the nineteenth in the set, is equalled in length only by Isidore's takedown of classical poets: putatively a "legend for an unguent seller" stocking "balsam, frankincense, reed, and saffron of Corycium," it provides an excuse for him to show off his knowledge of exotica from Arabia, India, and elsewhere, which "gifts are useful for many cures."[192] The point of reference is again the Etymologies, books four and seventeen ("On Rustic Matters"), where those products are specifically enumerated in the larger context of scents and aromatic trees and plants.[193] Evidently Isidore warmed to the theme because this poem, normally counted the first of a series adorning the episcopal drug store, is succeeded by five more on perfumes from China and the Yemen, salves from Greece and Italy, and vessels holding pigments, the last also tallying with his noted interest in storage containers in book twenty ("On Provisions and Various Implements").[194] The subject of these verses is not, or not only, places and things but the text of the Etymologies itself—a virtual bookstore.[195] Isidore sets his material to metre, creating images of a library, an infirmary, and a pharmacy, a bodega of knowledge run on Christian principles.

The final three poems shift our focus back from sources and materials to books and their production in the scriptorium. The attitude is stern, inexorable; the tone martial. Hailing the reader "who knows how to vie by reed and pen with dead skin," Isidore beckons him in: "may he wage his wars here."[196] The struggle is ceaseless, and "the copyist who is wandering around at midday" is liable to be hung up and "beaten about the back with pairs of whips."[197] A mordant sense of humour? No—the final poem is fragmentary, but the first three incomplete lines are concerned with the scribe who makes repeated mistakes when he ought to do better. Audience, be silent, for "the scribe does not suffer anyone to speak in his presence"; ultimately running out of patience, Isidore snaps, "here is not where you should carry on chattering. Get lost."[198] In the world constructed by these 27 poems, learning and literature are infinite but are clearly sorted into the beneficial and the harmful: steer a safe course, or suffer a deadly fall. Isidore himself cautions in his Rule, "let the monk beware of reading books by pagans or heretics, for it is better to be unaware of their pernicious teaching than to fall into some snare of error through experience."[199] Forewarned and forearmed, however, we can admit some good even in that heathen past. The same author takes quiet pride in his work, fashioning the knowledge both sacred and mundane which he marshals in his Etymologies into programmatic verses on medicine and orientalia. Perhaps in this spirit book four was the first to be written? Above all, knowledge is a serious business, labour with no more end than the works of Augustine. What, then, was the goal of the quest? Writing his poem on poetry itself, Isidore defines the task before him: to subordinate the pagan to the Christian, to realise the Augustinian impulse to harness antiquity and ride it out of Egypt to the Promised Land.[200]

6. Antiquity Reshelved

The middle of the 9th century saw a fight break out between Albarus of Cordoba, polemicist at large, and Bodo-Eleazar, a Christian convert to Judaism from Francia. Academic name-calling was the trigger, and Albarus did not take kindly to being labelled "a compiler (conpilator)," a mere transmitter of ideas and arguments.[201] Shaken, he never fully recovered from the blow, but how would Isidore, one of his heroes ("doctor of Hispania" to the Mozarabs), have reacted?[202] Centuries later, when Dante ascended into Paradise, he beheld "the glowing breath of Isidore flaming out," keeping celestial company with Boethius, Bede, and Richard of Saint-Victor: compilers all, yet who each created something new through compiling.[203] Isidore wrote his last words in 636, and strictly speaking did not join the "sacred corporation" of Church Doctors until 1722; what did he leave behind?[204] On one level, a language Christianised, as a generation after him Ildefonsus of Toledo took the "synonymous style" to its extreme in exhaustive, exhausting praise of the Virgin Mary (though Erasmus, for one, was not a fan of "authors like Isidore … at so many removes from copia that they are unable to express their thoughts in good Latin even once").[205] More to the point, a specifically Christian lexicography, a concern for correct and precise Christian expression, which may make the Carolingian experiment, properly, nothing more than an aspect of Isidorian reception history. But the weight of the Etymologies, their scale and their scope, encourages thinking of his legacy to us as a Christian encyclopaedia, when it should really be Christian encyclopaedism. In his historical writing Isidore set the Visigoths in the context of universal history, and in this overarching project he set Christian knowledge in the context of universal learning and language. Both were statements of belonging.

Look ahead, to the world after the Islamic conquest of Iberia in 711. The Collected Anecdotes, an Arabic compilation of the 11th century (maybe), describes Seville as the great city of the Peninsula, the seat of the Romans; when the Visigothic kings relocated the capital to Toledo, all the Roman aristocracy, clergy, and leading laymen remained behind.[206] What can this be but a memory of Isidore, his see—his library—the anchor of classical civilisation? New Latin chronicles too picked up where he had left off in his Histories, but with more than mere continuance, a hold still firm on that great binding chain: when the Mozarabic chronicler of 754 cried out in lament for his ruined Hispania, he despaired that anyone could express the loss, even "if all his limbs were to be turned into a tongue," echoing the words used by Isidore for his anxious inability to attain the insight of Gregory the Great and his Morals on Job.[207] The project, the struggle and the dream, an end to anxiety: the classical in service of the Christian, the farthest reaches of learning brought home and into order, catalogued and shelved in the mansions of God's library, awaiting consultation by the interested reader.

CHAPTER 4

Leander of Seville and His Influence on Isidore of Seville

Purificación Ubric Rabaneda

1 Introduction

Leander (d. 600/601), the eldest brother of Isidore, is one of the keys to understanding the historical, ideological, and cultural background from which his younger sibling emerged.[1] Leander, Isidore's predecessor as bishop of Seville, was one of the most influential political and religious characters of his time and played a pivotal role in the conversion of the Visigoths to Catholicism. Leander, an intellectual figure of some standing himself, looked carefully after the upbringing of Isidore and seems to have ensured that he received a high-quality intellectual, spiritual, and pastoral education. It would be fair to say that Leander prepared the path for Isidore to become one of the most influential figures of the early Middle Ages.

In spite of his great significance, the personality, role, works, and thought of Leander have not received as much scholarly attention as they might deserve.[2] Leander's achievements have often been downplayed in scholarly and popular accounts of the period, especially in comparison to those of Isidore. tendency is to introduce a highly optimistic, even euphoric, tone into depictions of Leander's achievements, especially regarding his role in the events that ended in the Visigoths' conversion from Arianism to the Nicene Creed in 589. Other scholars have been excessively cautious in their interpretations of Leander's involvement in these events.[3] The following pages situate Leander in his historical context and introduce his works, with the intention of facilitating understanding of his position in the political, religious, and cultural world of the later 6th century and hence of establishing the extent of his influence on Isidore.

The sources of information on Leander include: a short biographical sketch by Isidore in his De viris illustribus; a few lines by Leander himself addressed to his sister Florentina in De institutione virginum et contemptu mundi; and some brief references by Pope Gregory I, the chronicler John of Biclarum, and the historian Gregory of Tours. These references are scarce, at times contradictory, and difficult to interpret.[4] In addition, it is highly likely that the majority of Leander's own work has been lost.

2 The First Years of Leander

Leander was probably born sometime between 530 and 540 in the province of Carthaginiensis, perhaps in its capital, Cartagena (in the south-east of modern Spain). He was the eldest son of Severianus and of a woman of an unknown name, whom some scholars call "Turtur" due to Leander's reference (possibly metaphorical) in Leander's On the training of nuns and the contempt of the world.[5] Leander had, as far as we know, two brothers, Fulgentius and Isidore, and a sister, Florentina, the addressee of On the training of nuns and the contempt of the world.

[4] Isidore, De viris illustribus 28 (Isidore also mentions his brother Leander in his Chronica 408, Versus 13, and Epistola ad Claudium ducem 12); Leander, De institutione virginum 31; Gregory the Great, Epistola 1.41 (April 591), 5.53 (July 595), 9.228 (July 599), and Moralia, praefatio; John of Biclarum, Chronicon, s. a. 579–90; Gregory of Tours, Decem libri historiarum 5.38, 6.18, 6.43, 8.46. See also Paul the Deacon, Historia Langobardorum 3.21.

[5] Isidore, De viris illustribus 28 says about his brother Leander: "Leander whose father was Severian and was born in the Spanish province of Carthaginiensis was a monk by profession and from being a monk was made bishop of the the church in Seville in the province of Baetica" ("Leander, genitus patre Seueriano, Carthaginiensis prouinciae Hispaniae, professione monachus et ex monacho Hispaliensis ecclesiae prouinciae Baeticae constitutus episcopus"). From this, most scholars deduce his origin as being from Carthaginiensis. Roger Collins, Visigothic Spain 409–711 (Oxford: 2004), 154, however, interprets in a different way the Leander was probably around 14–16 years old when he left his terra natalis with his family and settled in Seville or in a territory close to the capital of the province of Baetica.[6] The causes and the date of the family's departure from Carthaginiensis have been debated by scholars. Based on Leander's words to his sister Florentina advising her not to return to her homeland, which had apparently been occupied by foreigners and had lost its fertility, the flight is usually located in the context of the civil war between the Visigoths Agila and Athanagild and the settlement of the Byzantines in the south-east of the Iberian Peninsula (c.552–55).[7] It has been argued that the family of Severianus supported the cause of Athanagild.[8] Another hypothesis is that Severianus and his family were expelled from Carthaginiensis by Agila because they and other passage of Isidore: "by profession a monk from the province of Spanish Carthaginiensis, he was made bishop of Seville in the province of Baetica." Collins suggests an African origin for the family and remarks that Isidore and Leander have Greek names. In his De institutione virginum 31.9, Leander points out: "Do not fly from the nest the dove has built and placed her chicks. You are the daughter of Simplicity, born with the Dove as your mother. In your one person you will carry out the duties of a surfeit of offices. Look to the Dove as your mother, listen to the Dove as your guide and hold she who bears you through Christ by her daily acts of love, dearer than the mother who gave you birth" ("Noli ab eo auolar nido quod inuenit turtur ubi reponat pullos suos. Simpliciatis filia es, quae Turture matre nata es. In eadem una persona complurium necessitudinum uteris officio. Turturem pro matrem respice, Turturem pro magistram attende; et quae te Christo cottidie adfectibus generat, cariorem qua nata es reputa matrem"). From these words, some scholars, such as Jacques Fontaine and Pierre Cazier, "Qui a chassé de Carthaginoise Sévérianus et les siens? Observations sur l'histoire familiale d'Isidore de Séville," in Estudios en Homenaje a don Claudio Sánchez Albornoz en sus 90 años (Buenos Aires: 1983), 349–400, 353–69, have suggested that the name of the mother of Leander, Isidore, Fulgentius, and Florentina was Turtur. Fontaine and Cazier also argue that the forced departure from her land made Turtur to go deeper in her Catholic faith and that she became abbess of a monastery after Severianus's death. The hypothesis of the name of Turtur is, however, not accepted by all scholars, many of whom see the sense of turtur in this passage as allegoric. The legends that make Severianus duke or governor of Carthaginiensis and establish family links between Severianus, the Ostrogothic King Theodoric, Leovigild, Reccared, Hermenegild, Leander, and Isidore, through Theodora, completely lack verisimilitude; see: Lucas of Tuy, Chronicon Mundi 2.68, and José Carlos Martín, "Vita ss. Leandri, Isidori Hispalensis, Fulgentii Astigitani et Braulionis Caesaraugustani ep. (BHL 4810). Traducción," e-Spania 12 (2011). There is no clear evidence either for speculations that make Leander's mother a Visigothic Arian who had converted to Catholicism.

powerful families of the region supported the Byzantine Empire.[9] Finally, other scholars think that Severianus and his family left Carthaginiensis for religious reasons, because they disagreed with the policy of the Byzantine Empire regarding the Three Chapters.[10]

For whatever reason, the family ended up settling in western Baetica, in particular in the area between Hispalis (Seville) and Astigi (Ecija). In this territory, where presumably Severianus and his family had properties and/or powerful connections, they attained a position of great power and influence.[11] Leander and Isidore became bishops of the important bishopric of Seville, and the other brother, Fulgentius, became bishop of Astigi (Ecija).[12] Their sister, Florentina, also professed the religious life, probably in a monastery in the area.[13] It would have been very difficult for newcomers to hold onto such powerful positions if they did not have access to strong local connections, influence, and wealth, and if they were not very powerful themselves. Episcopal dynasties, where members of the same family hold relevant ecclesiastical positions and/or where the episcopal see of a city was passed from one member of the family to another in succession, were highly regarded. They were a sign of prestige, honour, and devotion. As a consequence, many powerful families aimed to become one of these acclaimed ecclesiastical families and to increase in this way their social power and influence. Apart from Leander and his family, we know of other episcopal dynasties in the contemporary Spanish church: the brothers Justinian, Nebridius, Justus, and Eludius became, during Theudis's reign (531–48), bishops of Valentia, Egara (Tarrassa), Urgel, and probably Osca (Huesca). Bishop Paul (530–60), although of Greek origin, was succeed by his nephew Fidelis (560–71) in the bishopric of Merida in order to keep within the see the rich inheritance that Paul had received from wealthy locals. John (619–31) and his brother Braulio (631–51) were bishops of Sarragossa; their father, Gregory, was also a bishop of an unknown see.[14] In the same way that these episcopal dynasties played a significant role in their area of influence, Leander's family, with their relevant ecclesiastical offices, held great power and influence in western Baetica.

[9] This is the main thesis of Fontaine and Cazier in "Qui a chassé de Carthaginoise." Martyn, Saint Leander, thinks that the cause of the flight of the family of Leander was an Arian Visigothic attack on Cartagena, and that Leander, Isidore, and Fulgentius ended up at Seville, whereas their parents and Florentina went to Carthage in north Africa.

[10] See, with bibliography, Federico M. Beltrán, "San Leandro de Sevilla y sus actitudes político-religiosas (nuevas observaciones sobre su historia familiar)," in Actas I Coloquio de Historia Antigua de Andalucía (Córdoba: 1993), 2:335–48. For the Three Chapters controversy, the Spanish Catholic Church's attitude toward it, and its political and religious consequences, see Abilio Barbero, "El conflicto de los Tres Capítulos y las iglesias hispánicas en los siglos VI y VII," in La sociedad visigoda en su entorno histórico (Madrid: 1992), 136–67, and Margarita Vallejo, "Desencuentros entre el emperador Justiniano y las iglesias hispanas," in V Reunión de Arqueología Cristiana Hispánica (Barcelona: 2000), 573–83.

[11] See García Moreno, "La Andalucía de San Isidoro," and Fontaine and Cazier, "Qui a chassé de Carthaginoise," 371, who remark that the family would have territories in the Baetica, as well as in Carthaginiensis, something that was very common amongst the rich and powerful aristocrats of the time.

[12] García Moreno, Prosopografía, 99.

[13] Leander, De institutione virginum; Fontaine and Cazier, "Qui a chassé de Carthaginoise," argue that Florentina was the abbess of a monastery of women, although we do not have any confirmatory evidence, nor Martyn's thesis, Saint Leander, 49, according to which Florentina professed first in a monastery in Carthage and afterwards became abbess of the convent of Saint María de Valle in Ecija.

At an unknown date, Leander became a monk in an unknown monastery. Sometime before 579 he was named bishop of Seville, making him metropolitan of the province of Baetica, presumably with the support of the local nobility and/or the Visigothic monarchy.[15] The pivotal political role he developed in the following years may confirm this thesis.[16]

3 The Role of Leander in the Rebellion of Hermenegild

Seville, the city in which Leander, and after him Isidore, held the office of bishop, was the capital of the province of Baetica. It occupied an important strategic location and played a prominent political and religious role within the province. During the 5th century, the Sueves and Visigoths had disputed its control, during which conflict they called on the support of powerful—and often opposed—local families.[17] Seville had been a key point of contention in the war of the early 550s between Agila (d. 555) and Athanagild (d. 567), and it was not long before it again became a point of disagreement in a broader struggle for power. In this conflict, Leander played a leading role.[18]

[15] For Leander as monk and bishop, see Isidore, De viris illustribus 28. Being a monk before becoming a bishop was regarded very positively in the late antique church: Claudia Rapp, Holy Bishops in Late Antiquity. The Nature of Christian Leadership in an Age of Transition (Berkeley: 2005); Andrea Sterk, Renouncing the World yet Leading the Church: The Monk-Bishop in Late Antiquity (Cambridge, Mass.: 2004). Scholars argue that the appointment of Leander as bishop of Seville would have taken place before Hermenegild's rebellion, which started in 579.

[16] For royal support for Severianus and his family and the accession of Leander to the episcopacy of Seville, see García Moreno, Leovigildo, 110, and "La Andalucía de San Isidoro," 566.

In 573, in order to prevent potential future disputes over the kingship, King Leovigild (d. 586) associated his two sons, Hermenegild (d. 585), and Reccared (d. 601), with him on the throne.[19] As part of his policy of consolidating and strengthening the Visigothic monarchy, Leovigild also agreed to the marriage of his two sons with princesses from the Merovingian kingdoms of Austrasia and Neustria. Thus, Hermenegild, Leovigild's eldest son, married Ingundis (d. 584), daughter of Brunhild (d. 613) and Sigibert (d. 575) and granddaughter of Leovigild's second wife, Goswintha (d. 589), the widow of Athanagild, one of his predecessors on the Visigothic throne. It seems that shortly after Hermenegild's marriage, Leovigild entrusted him with the government of a part of the Visigothic kingdom's territory in the south. Hermenegild took up residence at Seville, presumably the centre of this territory.[20] There, in 579, Hermenegild rebelled against his father and proclaimed his rule as sole sovereign of the Visigothic kingdom.[21]

The causes, purposes, and role of Leander in Hermenegild's rebellion have been the subject of much controversy and discussion.[22] According to the contemporary Spanish chronicler John of Biclarum, the conflict between father and son was initiated by domestic strife (domestica rixa). He also records under the year 579 that Hermenegild rebelled, with the "faction of Goswintha" (factione Goswinthae).[23] Gregory of Tours, who wrote about these events some years after they had taken place, also assigns to Goswintha a primary role, underlining her determination to force her granddaughter's conversion to Arianism.[24] The religious factor was, indeed, a pivotal component of the rebellion, as at some point Hermenegild converted from Arianism to Catholicism.[25] Ever since the Visigoths had first embraced Arianism around the mid-4th century, it had become a key sign of their identity, distinguishing them from the majority Catholic Roman population of Hispania.[26] When the Visigothic kingdom was created in the course of the 5th century the religious boundary between the two groups was still maintained. By Leander's time, however, there were some sectors on the Visigothic/Arian and on the Hispano Roman/Catholic side that were more open to a union of creeds within the kingdom.[27] It may have been the case that some groups saw the rebellion of Hermenegild as an opportunity to achieve this aim.

[21] García Moreno, "La Andalucía de San Isidoro," 565, suggests that, prior to the revolt of his eldest son, Leovilgild may have shown preference for his youngest son, Reccared, to whom he dedicated the city of Recopolis. Other scholars, such as Roger Collins, "¿Dónde estaban los arrianos en 589?" in Concilio III de Toledo. XIV Centenario 589–1989 (Toledo: 1991), 211–22, give a later chronology to Hermenegild's rebellion, dating it to *c.*582–83.

[22] Scholarly interpretations range from those who give Hermenegild a prominent position in the revolt against his father to those who introduce him as a puppet of Leander, the Catholic Church, his wife Ingundis, and/or Goswintha. To understand Hermenegild's rebellion it is very important to value, analyse, and point out the interests and positions of the several factions that took part in the struggle: the Visigothic clans, the Merovingian kingdoms, the Byzantine Empire, the Suevic kingdom, powerful noblemen, and the Sullivan*, eds. Thomas F.X. Noble and John Joseph Contreni (Kalamazoo: 1987), 55–76. For Goswintha as instigator, see García Moreno, Leovigildo, esp. 102–07, and Castellanos, Los Godos y la Cruz, esp. 114–16. However, Domínguez del Val, Leandro de Sevilla, 28, along with other researchers, thinks that Goswintha, a radical Arian, incited Leovigild to combat his Catholic son.

[25] Scholars have also valued the significance of the religious component of the rebellion in a very different way, from those who think it was the crucial factor to those for whom it was something secondary, of no importance at all. See, for example, E.A. Thompson, "The Conversion of the Visigoths to Catholicism," Nottingham Medieval Studies 4 (1960), 4–35; Biagio Saitta, "Un momento di disgregazione nel regno visigoto di Spagna: la rivolta di Ermenegildo," Quaderni Catanesi di Studi Classici e Medievali 1 (1979), 81–134; Roger Collins, "King Leovigild and the Conversion of the Visigoths," in Law, Culture and Regionalism in Early Medieval Spain (Aldershot: 1992), 1–12.

Contemporary sources give several versions of the events surrounding the rebellion.[28] The Iberian sources written after the eventual conversion of the kingdom to Catholicism, such as John of Biclarum and Isidore of Seville, call Hermenegild tyrannus and completely downplay his conversion to the Catholic position and the role played by Leander in the rebellion.[29] Sources written outside the Iberian Peninsula, however, give a quite different view. Thus, Gregory the Great attributes the conversion of Hermenegild to the preaching of his friend Leander and presents Hermenegild as a martyr for the Catholic faith.[30] Gregory of Tours, a supporter of the Merovingians, attributed Hermenegild's conversion to his wife, Ingundis (a Merovingian princess).[31] For Gregory of Tours, however, Hermenegild's Catholic faith did not justify the rebellion and usurpation of legitimate power from his (heretical) father. Gregory calls Hermenegild miserable and points out he will have to face God's judgement for having risen up against his father.[32]

[28] For an evaluation of the sources, see Luis Vázquez de Parga, San Hermenegildo ante las fuentes históricas (Madrid: 1973).

[29] John of Biclarum, Chronicon s. a. 579, 3, and 583: "King Leovigild pinned down his rebel son in a great siege" ("Leuvigildus rex … rebellen filium graui obsidione concludit"). Isidore, for his part, says in his Historia Gothorum 49: "[Leovigild] then besieged and defeated his son Hermenegild who was attempting to usurp his power" ("Hermenegildum deinde filium imperiis suis tyranizantem obsessum exsuperavit"). Isidore, De viris illustribus 28, points out the outstanding role of his brother in the conversion of the Visigoths, but he does not mention anything about Hermenegild's conversion or the intervention of his brother in the revolt. In Isidore, as in other Iberian sources, all the credit for the conversion of the Visigoths to the Nicene faith goes to Reccared. This was not the first time the sources silenced the conversion of a barbarian king to Catholicism with the purpose of extolling a rival king's conversion, Purificación Ubric, "The Church in the Suevic Kingdom (A.D. 411–585)," in Culture and Society in Medieval Galicia: A Cultural Crossroads at the Edge of Europe, ed. James D'Emilio (London: 2015), 210–43.

[30] Gregory the Great, Dialogus 3.31. Gregory the Great is the author who gives the most positive view of Hermenegild, probably because his main source of information was his close friend Leander. He could also have had other sources, as he points out "as we have learnt from the accounts of the many people who have come from Spain" ("sicut multorum qui ab Hispaniis partibus ueniunt relatione cognouimus"). When Gregory wrote of the martyrdom of Hermenegild, Reccared had been ruling the Visigothic kingdom for around eight years. Gregory attributes the conversion of his brother to Hermenegild's mediation. This information might, however, be understood in the context of the struggle between East and West and the role developed by martyrs in it. It is not politics that mattered here but religion, and to introduce Hermenegild as a martyr of the Catholic faith served this purpose, Castellanos, Los Godos y la Cruz, 120–22. It is very significant that the first Iberian author that judges Hermenegild as a kind of martyr is the monk Valerius of Bierzo (a figure usually understood as opposed to established ecclesiastical authority) in his De uana saeculi sapientia 6, which was written at the end of the 7th century. It was not until the 16th century, during the reign of Philip II (1556–98), who was zealously concerned with magnifying the figure of Hermenegild as a Catholic martyr and saint, when Hermenegild received recognition for his martyrdom for the faith. Philip II indeed promoted his canonisation and brought his relics from Sigena to the Escorial. See Vázquez de Parga, San Hermenegildo.

Some scholars have argued that Hermenegild's rebellion was a usurpation of power on the part of the Balths—the clan of Goswintha's previous husband—to Visigothic rule. It is very significant in this regard that the son of Hermenegild and Ingundis was called Athanagild, like his grandfather.[33] We must not forget that, according to some scholars, Severianus and his family had supported Athanagild, and their loyalty had been rewarded with, among other things, Leander's promotion to the episcopacy of Seville.[34] If these two interpretations are correct, then Leander's support for Hermenegild in opposition to other powerful noblemen and ecclesiastics can be interpreted as a continuation of earlier cooperation between an elite Hispano-Roman Catholic family and one of the dominant groups within the Visigothic aristocracy.

Leander might have acted as a kind of personal advisor of Hermenegild. The "propaganda" efforts of Hermenegild and the formulation of his rebellion as a religious persecution have even been attributed to Leander.[35] Very significant in this respect is the way that Hermenegild presents himself, claiming God's sanction for his usurpation.[36] This has been interpreted as part of a broader attempt by Hermenegild and Leander to secure the support of powerful Catholic allies, including the Byzantine Empire, the Suevic kingdom, and Catholic sectors of the Spanish church and nobility.[37]

[31] Gregory of Tours, Decem libri historiarum 5.38. García Moreno, "La Andalucía de San Isidoro," 566, n. 61, refers to a manuscript version of Isidore's Historia Gothorum (MS of the Academia de la Historia de Madrid, A-189, 12th century) where the conversion of Hermenegild is attributed to both, to his wife and to Leander: "in part due to his wife's lecturings and in part due to Leander's preaching" ("partium uxoris moneritis, partium Leandri predicatione").

[32] Gregory of Tours, Decem libri historiarum 5.38, 6.18, and 6.43. Gregory of Tours' references to Leovigild and to Hermenegild's revolt and conversion lack historical reliability, as his purpose is mainly apologetic. He wrote after the events and his chronology is not accurate, García Moreno, Leovigild, esp. 102–07, 112, and Castellanos, Los Godos y la Cruz, esp. 114–16.

[33] The baby was born shortly after their marriage (Epistolae Austrasicae 27 and 28), and for some scholars would be the trigger of the rebellion, not the conversion of Hermenegild to Catholicism, as other authors point out. García Moreno, Leovigildo, 117–18, remarks that Hermenegild's conversion to Catholicism would not enter into the plans of the fervent Arian Goswintha. It would put into opposition her and the Goths who supported her and would diminish support for Hermenegild's rebellion.

[34] According to García Moreno, Leovigildo, 22–3, n. 15, the entry of John of Biclarum, Chronicon s. a. 585.7 in relation to Leander's splendour: "Leander, the bishop of the Church of Seville, was held in high esteem" ("Leander Hispalensis ecclesiae episcopus clarus habetur") may refer to Leander's opposition to Leovigild, in the same way as other entries on prominent Catholic ecclesiastics.

[35] See García Moreno, Leovigildo, 111, and Beltrán, "San Leandro de Sevilla."

In effect, it is likely that Hermenegild knew that his father's forces were stronger than his own. He therefore needed the assistance that these Catholic parties, in particular the Byzantine Empire, could provide. It was therefore with the intention of obtaining the support of the Byzantines that Leander travelled to Constantinople sometime between 579 and 586.[38] Gregory the Great, who was at that time in the capital of the Byzantine Empire as papal emissary, tells us that Leander came to Constantinople "on an embassy from the Visigoths, charged with dealing with a number of matters of Christian faith."[39] It seems that the Byzantine Empire promised some kind of help, but with priorities in other places and facing a delicate economic situation, Leovigild's offer of 30,000 solidi in return for neutrality was greeted positively by the imperial authorities. Ultimately, therefore, Leander's journey to Constantinople was in vain.[40]

[36] Illustrative in this regard is the inscription "God grant long life to the king" (Regi a Deo Vita), which appears on Hermenegild's coins. For interpretations of Hermenegild's coins, see Felipe Mateu y Llopis, "En el XIV centenario de Hermenegildus rex. La pugna de 574–585 testimoniada por los tremises godos," Numisma, 186–91 (1984), 189–94, and Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz, "La leyenda Regi a Deo Vita de una moneda de Ermenegildo," Analecta Sacra Tarraconensia, 31 (1958), 261–69. Further evidence of Hermenegild's propaganda effort is an inscription found in Alcalá of Guadaira, see Concepción Fernández Martínez and Joan Gómez Pallarés, "Hermenegildo, ¿para siempre en Sevilla? Una nueva interpretación de IHC, n. 76=ILCV n.50," Gerión 19 (2001), 629–58. The epigrapher A. Stylow, however, thinks that the inscription may be a falsification of the 16th century designed to promote Hermenegild's sanctity, García Moreno, Leovigildo, 111, n. 274. This formula, as well as other elements of Hermenegild's "propaganda," are very similar to descriptions of Reccared's rule at the Third Council of Toledo, where Leander had a very active role, García Moreno, Leovigildo, 113–15.

[37] Gregory of Tours, Decem libri historiarum 5.38, 6.18, and 6.43. The Suevic king Miro sent an army to support Hermenegild, which was defeated by Leovigild, John of Biclarum, Chronicon s. a. 583, 1, and Gregory of Tours. Decem libri historiarum 6.43. It is worth noting that Hermenegild would not have been able to count on the support of all of the powerful Catholic families, even in those areas that were the focus of his rebellion (Lusitania and Baetica). Many of them would have viewed him as tyrannous.

[38] For Leander's trip to Constantinople, purposes, analysis, documentation, and bibliography, see Margarita Vallejo, Hispania y Bizancio. Una relación desconocida (Madrid: 2012), 249–50, Castellanos, Los Godos y la Cruz, and García Moreno, Leovigildo, 117–20 (who claims prior contact between Hermenegild and the Byzantine governor of Hispania and points out that the long stay of Leander in Constantinople may indicate that there were difficulties in reaching an agreement). The dates of Leander's journey and stay in Constantinople are based on several pieces of information. First, in 579 Hermenegild started his rebellion against his father, so Leander could not have been at Constantinople before that year. Second, in 586 Leovigild died, and according to Gregory the Great (Moralia In Job, praefatio), Leander was back by this time. Additional pieces of evidence are the stay of Gregory the Great in Constantinople from 579 to 586, during which time he developed a close friendship with Leander, and the fact that in the imperial capital Leander also met John the Faster (Isidore, De viris illustribus 25), who was patriarch from 582 to 595. In Constantinople Leander may have met the Emperor Tiberius, his successor Maurice, or both of them.

In order to end his son's revolt, Leovigild deployed, in addition to a wide range of military and diplomatic resources, a considerable religious and ideological counteroffensive, which had among its aims the unification of Catholics and Arians under the same creed.[41] Thus, shortly after Hermenegild's conversion, in 580, Leovigild called Arian bishops to a council, which tried to smooth over differences between the faiths by aligning their theological positions. At this council some requirements to convert from Catholicism to Arianism were simplified. One of these was the requirement of a ceremony of rebaptism upon entry into Arianism, a procedure which was deemed as unnecessary in the future; a laying on of hands was henceforth enough.[42] Leovigild also focussed on linking the Catholic Church to the Visigothic monarchy. He sought to establish a kind of national Gothic church that was opposed to the Roman-Byzantine church that supported Hermenegild and was considered heretical in the West due to its defence of the Three Chapters.[43] Leovigild furthermore took measures against key Catholic figures, such as Masona (d. 605), bishop of Merida. Later Catholic sources would present these actions as part of a wide-ranging religious persecution on the part of Leovigild.[44] To counter this offensive, which had managed to attract the support of some Catholic bishops, such as Vincent of Saragossa and Nepopis of Merida, Leander wrote three anti-Arian works, in which he exposed the Arian errors in the light of Catholic doctrine.[45]

Other scholars have related the switch of the Byzantine policy to the accession of Emperor Maurice (Tiberius died in 582), Vallejo, Hispania y Bizancio, esp. 249–56. It is difficult to date the moment in which Leovigild gave the solidi to the Byzantines and made an agreement with them. It seems likely that it would have been at a crucial moment in the dispute, when Seville had fallen into Leovigild's hands and Hermenegild and his family had taken refuge with the Byzantines, see García Moreno, Leovigildo, 157–58.

[41] Contemporary sources offer contrasting appraisals of the reign of Leovigild. Whereas his policy of unifying the kingdom militarily is highly praised, the image of the monarch and of his religious policy is quite negative. On the religious counteroffensive of Leovigild, see García Moreno, Leovigildo, 127–37.

[42] John of Biclarum, Chronicon s. a. 580, 2; Isidore, Historia Gothorum 50. Rodríguez (eds.), La colección canónica hispana, 6 vols (Madrid: 1966–2002), 5:82.

After several years of struggle during which Leovigild established his dominance, Seville was besieged and taken in 584. Shortly afterwards, Hermenegild was captured by his brother Reccared's forces in Cordoba, in the basilica of S. Acisclus, where he had sought sanctuary. Finally, in 585 Hermenegild was murdered in Tarragona, probably with the consent of Leovigild and Reccared.[46]

His open support for Hermenegild compromised Leander's position. It is likely that he stayed in Constantinople and evaluated what to do next. This was later depicted as an exile by Isidore, who never refers to Leander's involvement with Hermenegild's rebellion.[47] Leander stayed in the imperial capital until the political and religious situation in the Visigothic polity changed. This did not take long.

[43] García Moreno, Leovigildo, 120–27, argues that the alliance and negotiations of Hermenegild with the Byzantine Empire would not have been viewed positively by the majority of the Catholic Church and the Hispano-Roman population, who considered the emperors as heretics due to their policies regarding the Three Chapters.

Scholars have questioned the veracity of the testimony of Gregory the Great, Dialogus 3.31, who attributes to Leovigild the death of his son Hermenegild (for bibliography and discussion, see Domínguez del Val, Leandro de Sevilla, 32–35). For the military counteroffensive of Leovigild, see García Moreno, Leovigildo, especially 127–73.

[47] On Leander's exile, Isidore, De viris illustribus 28. The exile of Leander due to his opposition to King Leovigild has led to discussion and speculation, especially its location (Cartagena or Constantinople) and its dates. For some scholars, Leander travelled several times to Constantinople, first as ambassador of Hermenegild and secondly when exiled by Leovigild. Other scholars, as Beltrán, "San Leandro de Sevilla," and García Moreno, Leovigildo, think that, after the defeat of Hermenegild, Leander's stay in Constantinople became an exile. For discussion, see Domínguez del Val, Leandro de Sevilla, 41–6, and Castellanos, Los Godos y la Cruz, 124–29.

4 Leander, Reccared, and the Third Council of Toledo

There can be no doubt that Reccared was the greatest beneficiary of the failure of Hermenegild's revolt, which eased his path to the kingship when his father died in 586. Contrary to what might be expected given the failure of Hermenegild, Reccared decided to turn around the religious policy of the Visigothic kingdom. In effect, he realised the best means of unifying the Visigothic and Hispano-Roman elements of the kingdom was not behind Arianism, as Leovigild had attempted without success, but by converting the Visigoths to Catholicism. In deciding on Catholicism, Reccared gained for his cause powerful supporters of Hermenegild, Leander among them.[48] According to Gregory the Great and Gregory of Tours, Leovigild himself had actually converted to Catholicism, possibly on his deathbed, where he entrusted Leander with the care and counsel of Reccared.[49]

It is not clear to what extent Leander was involved in the personal conversion of Reccared, which took place in 587, ten months after his ascension to the throne.[50] Reccared decided to act more cautiously than his brother had done.

[48] For the policy of Reccared, which had among its aims to change old enemies into new allies, see Castellanos, Los Godos y la Cruz, esp. 143–65. Leander might have re-entered the Iberian Peninsula via Cartagena. In a letter written in 595 by Licinianus of Cartagena (Epistola 1) to Gregory the Great, Licinianus complains that Leander's stay in the city was too short and did not allow him to examine an unfinished copy of Gregory's Moralia that Leander had brought with him. Although it is not possible to give an exact date for these events, scholars relate them to the return of Leander from Constantinople. Thus, Josep Vilella, "Gregorio Magno e Hispania," Studia Ephemeridis Augustinianum 33 (1991), 167–86, argues that it was Leovigild who recalled Leander: the bishop of Seville was in a hurry to meet the king, hence his rush and his short stay in Cartagena. García Moreno, "La Andalucía de San Isidoro," 569–71, and García Moreno, Leovigildo, 34, n. 48, and 172–73, thinks that Leander returned after the death of Leovigild, at which point he decided to change sides and support Reccared against the Byzantine Empire. García Moreno bases his arguments on Leander, De institutione virginum 31, where he shows a very negative view of the Byzantines and concern about his brother Fulgentius, who was in Cartagena at the time of writing. It is also significant that Leander did not act as ambassador to the Byzantine Empire when Reccared needed one, in spite of his previous experience (although he would recommend his close friend Gregory for this mission, Gregory the Great, Epistola 9.229). In addition, the harsh Byzantine policy toward bishops in their Iberian territory might have encouraged them to collaborate with Leander and the Catholic Church.

[49] Gregory the Great, Dialogus 3.31, and Gregory of Tours, Decem libri historiarum 8.46. This information has been questioned by scholars, many of whom do not consider it credible.

[50] Isidore does not mention Reccared's personal conversion at all. According to John of Biclarum, Chronicon s. a. 587, 5, the king converted to Catholicism "With God's aid" (deo iuuante). Gregory of Tours, Decem libri historiarum 9.15, states that the conversion occurred because Reccared was "moved to repentance through God's mercy" ("conpunctus miseratione divina"). The same idea is recorded in the Third Council of Toledo. In his Chronicon Fredegar says that Reccared was baptised in private, and after him all the Visigothic Arian people, something defended by E.A. Thompson, Los godos en España (Madrid: 1971), 108 and 111. Re-baptism, however, was contradictory to the common practice for passing from Arianism to Catholicism, Third Council of Toledo, anathema 15, Martínez Díez and Rodríguez, La colección canónica hispana, 5:82. Some scholars, such as Domínguez del Val, Leandro de Sevilla, 54–65, attributes to Leander the conversion of Reccared. Others, like Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz, "Introducción general," in José Oroz Reta and Manuel A. Marcos Casquero, trans., San Isidoro de Sevilla, Etimologías (Madrid: 2004), 21, think it was the results of evangelisation by Abbot Eutropius, who collaborated closely with Leander in the council and its preparations, John of Biclarum, Chronicon, s. a. 590, 1.

Thus, before making his conversion official and extending it to the entirety of the Visigothic population, the king took some measures to prepare the way. There were several meetings with the main representatives of the Arian and the Catholic churches to discuss key points of contention and to overcome potential resistance.[51] The council at which the official unification of Catholic Hispano-Romans and Arian Visigoths under the Nicene Creed would take place was also carefully planned.[52] We learn from John of Biclarum that Leander of Seville and Eutropius, abbot of the monastery of Servitanum (and later Bishop of Valencia), one of the most influential cultural and intellectual centres of Catholicism in the kingdom, were pivotal figures in the council and its preparations.[53] Scholars have noticed some similarities between Reccared's propaganda and policy and those of Hermenegild, which may indicate the influence of Leander.[54]

The Third Council of Toledo, held in 589, made official the conversion of the Visigoths to Arianism.[55] Reccared was presented as a new Constantine (d. 337)

[55] The attention that John of Biclarum, Chronicon s. a. 590, 1, gives to the council in comparison to other entries in his chronicle is significant. The Third Council of Toledo has been viewed as a landmark in the history of Spain, often interpreted from a strongly nationalistic and Catholic perspective. Díaz y Díaz, "Introducción general," 24, n. 51, points out in this regard as very revealing in the book El Concilio III de Toledo base de la nacionalidad y and Marcian (d. 457), who had convened the Councils of Nicaea (325) and Chalcedon (451), respectively, presiding over a council that would be a benchmark for the future. The council itself was also presented as the heir to previous ecumenical councils.[56] Within a Byzantine-style ceremonial, King Reccared, together with Queen Baddo, the noblemen of the court, and the Arian bishops, confessed their conversion to the Catholic faith and their renunciation of Arianism.[57] Catholic bishops and abbots congratulated them with extreme joy. The council also laid the groundwork for the establishment of a truly unified church within the Visigothic kingdom, within which monarchy and episcopacy would collaborate side by side.

Leander seems to have played a leading role at the council. He delivered the closing homily, and some scholars attribute to him the authorship of most of its canons, as well as its liturgical, dogmatic, and disciplinary innovations.[58] Although the records of the council give the impression of a great celebration, reading between the lines, things were perhaps not so harmonious and friendly. Several pieces of evidence suggest that the alliance of monarchy and episcopacy for the sake of unity masked a situation of tension and disagreement, as both king and bishops benefitted and lost something from the new alliance.[59] The text of the council can be read to suggest a contrast between the image of King Reccared as the driving force behind the conversion and Leander's closing homily, which ignores the king completely and uses biblical and Patristic quotations to demonstrate the central role of Christ and his church in the conversion.[60] We must not forget that Leander and Reccared had recently been on civilización española (Madrid: 1891), with the conciliar texts in Latin, Basque, Arabic, Castilian Spanish, Catalan, Galician, and Portuguese. The bibliography on the Third Council of Toledo is overwhelming. For a general view, with several studies, see Concilio III de Toledo.

[58] See, with bibliography, Beltrán, "San Leandro de Sevilla," 347. Further evidence of Leander's prominence in the council is the fact that he signed the acts of the council fourth, after the king and the bishops of Merida and Toledo.

[59] Díaz y Díaz, "Introducción general," 26, argues that, during the negotiations with Leander and Eutropius, Arians and Catholics made concessions in order to achieve unity.

[60] Reccared attributes to himself not just the merit of the conversion of the Visigoths, but also of the Sueves, who had already embraced Catholicism some decades before, Ubric, "The Church in the Suevic Kingdom." Scholars also remark on the tardiness with which Reccared communicated the conversion to Pope Gregory the Great, a close friend of different sides during Hermenegild's rebellion and that Reccared was implicated in his brother's death. It seems, however, that the ultimately strong desire of Leander and Reccared, as leaders of church and the royal government, to attain religious unity within the kingdom overrode any personal animosity.[61]

The silence of the Iberian sources on the thorny issue of Hermenegild's rebellion and conversion and their very positive view of Reccared and his kingdom could not hide the fact that not all Arian or Catholic sectors of the population agreed completely with their leaders' policy of religious unification.[62] Reccared had to face several rebellions led by powerful Arians in Merida, Narbonne, and Toledo before the council was held in 589.[63] The Catholic episcopacy were by no means unanimous in agreeing to the decisions of the Third Council of Toledo either, especially regarding the status of former Arian ecclesiastics within the Catholic Church, a debate that is revealed by the records of the Council of Saragossa, held in 592.[64]

Despite such early differences, on balance the alliance of monarchy and episcopacy seems to have had positive effects for both parties. From now on bishops would support a monarchy that became increasingly involved in the internal affairs of the Church. Over time, ecclesiastical decisions in councils would have the force of civil law and bishops would take part in administering the fiscal apparatus of the state. The rulings of the council also seem to have been applied almost immediately after its celebration. Thus, Leander, as metropolitan of the province of Baetica, called a council in 590 in Seville, where Baetican bishops addressed problems regarding ecclesiastical patrimony and clerical chastity.[65] Key Catholic figures who had collaborated closely with the king were furthermore rewarded shortly after the council. Thus, the abbot Eutropius was consecrated as bishop of Valencia and John of Biclarum as bishop of Gerona.[66]

The conversion of the Visigoths to Catholicism also closed the confessional gap that, due to political and doctrinal issues, such as the Byzantines' posture towards the Three Chapters, had until that point existed between the territory in the hands of the Byzantines and the Catholics in the Visigothic kingdom. Some bishops who were close to Leander, such as Severus of Malaga and Licinianus of Cartagena, were suspected of disloyalty by the Byzantine Empire. In fact, Licinianus may have been poisoned in Constantinople in 602, where he had been called to give an explanation of his actions. Another means of counteracting the potential sympathy of the ecclesiastical hierarchy of the church in Byzantine territory for the newly Catholic Visigoths was through the appointment to the episcopate and the clergy of persons favourable to the imperial cause.[67]

In short, Leander was one of the main manufacturers of the united Visigothic Catholic kingdom, in which monarchy and episcopacy would collaborate towards the same goal, to create and strengthen the Visigothic Catholic monarchy. His brother, Isidore, would take this work even further.

5 Leander and Gregory the Great

As mentioned above, Leander and Gregory met sometime between 579 and 586 in Constantinople, when both of them were participating in diplomatic missions—Gregory as ambassador of the papacy, and Leander as Hermenegild's envoy.[68] At the imperial capital, Leander and Gregory established an intimate and lasting friendship.[69] It seems that they encouraged one another in their works. Thus, at Leander's request, Gregory wrote one of his major works, the Moralia in Job (Commentary on Job).[70] Leander returned to the Iberian Peninsula from Constantinople with a draft of the work.[71] Later on, in 595, Gregory again sent Leander part of his Moralia, together with a letter and a copy of his Regula Pastoralis.[72] Gregory's influence can also be clearly traced in Leander's writings.[73]

When Gregory became pope, he and Leander exchanged several letters. Four from Gregory to Leander, dated in 591, 595, and 599, have survived.[74] The letters from Leander to Gregory are no longer extant. Gregory's letter in which he shares with Leander his deepest personal and spiritual concerns, shows the closeness, trust, and appreciation that they professed for each other.[75] Gregory's confidence in Leander was recognised by sending him the pallium, a relic that had been in contact with the body of St Peter and blessed during his feast. This gift probably granted Leander status of vicar of the apostolic see in Spain.[76]

From Leander, Gregory would presumably have been aware of political and religious affairs in the Iberian Peninsula, such as Hermenegild's pretensions, the conversion of Reccared and the Visigoths to Catholicism, and the controversies within the church there. Gregory indeed heard first of the conversion of Reccared and the Arian Visigoths not from the king but from Leander. Reccared would not communicate it personally to Gregory until sometime later.[77] Moreover, from Gregory's Ep. 1.41 we learn that Leander had asked Gregory for advice on a controversy within the Spanish Church on the use of single or triple immersion during baptism.

Leander also seems to have been a key connection between the Visigothic monarchy of Reccared and the apostolic see, enabling him to play a balancing role in their delicate political relationship with the Byzantine Empire. Thus, in one of his letters to the pope, Reccared asked Gregory for a copy of the treaty between Justinian and Athanagild, in which Byzantine possessions in the Iberian Peninsula were established. Gregory answered him diplomatically, ignoring Reccared's petition and stating that the document had been lost in a fire.[78] The role of Leander in the relationship between Gregory and Reccared and the high esteem both had for Leander is shown in Gregory's introduction of Reccared as the common son of Leander and of himself and in the praise that both pope and king lavished on the excellent qualities of the bishop of Seville.[79] Leander was also likely the link between Gregory and other influential Spaniards, such as the clarissimus dux Claudius.[80]

6 Works and Theology

Leander was not only notable for his work in the political and pastoral realms. He was also prominent in the intellectual and spiritual fields. In his Chronicle under Reccared's reign (586–601) Isidore states: "bishop Leander is considered outstanding in Spain for his knowledge and faith," and in a letter to his colleague Claudius he notes, "Remember the teacher we both had, Leander, and copy with all your might his orthodox faith" ("memento communis nostri doctoris Leandri, et eius fidem atque doctrinam pro uiribus imitare").[81] Isidore also dedicated to Leander the following verse: "You are certainly thought to rival the scholars of old, Leander, and your words prove this to teachers."[82]

Leander wrote several works. Only two of them, a treatise on virginity to his sister Florentina and the homily that closed the Third Council of Toledo, have survived. From them we learn that Leander had an excellent formation and education in classical, biblical, and Patristic studies, as well as in rhetoric. His Latin was fluent and elegant, and he was able to adapt his discourse to his audience, as is evidenced by comparison of the plain speech to his sister with the grandiloquent and majestic sermon at the Third Council of Toledo.

6.1 De institutione uirginum et de comtemptu mundi

On the training of nuns and the contempt of the world is a treatise addressed by Leander to his sister Florentina, probably on the occasion of her profession as a nun.[83] In this work, written in a very familiar, affectionate, and elegant style, Leander presents to his sister the advantages of espousing Christ, abandoning the world, and living a monastic and ascetic life.[84] After a long introduction praising virginity and its superiority to the worldly life of a wealthy young woman, there are thirty-one chapters in which Leander deals with a virgin's virtues, especially sobriety, temperance, charity, humility, and silence. He also gives precepts for religious and social life. The guidelines for monastic life are inspired by Tertullian and Cyprian, with contributions by Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Cassian, and Benedict of Nursia, and a number of personal touches from Leander.[85]

This text, which Isidore calls libellus in the De viris illustribus, has been transmitted as the "Rule of Leander" (Regula s. Leandri or Regula virginum).[86]

[85] The thesis according to which Leander would have also based his work on Osius of Cordoba's De laude uirginitatus and Severus of Malaga's Annulus is not supported by many scholars.

[86] For discussion on the literary character of the writing, a letter, a treatise, or a rule, with bibliography, see Oronzo Giordano, "Leandro di Siviglia: lettera alla sorella Fiorentina

Manuscripts have preserved two versions of this work. One of them is short, at twenty-one chapters, and the other, first discovered in 1948, is longer and, according to scholars, more in line with the original. It included thirty-one chapters.[87]

The date at which Leander wrote this work has been subject of discussion. Based on the biographical information given in Chapter 31, it has been argued that Leander wrote it as a kind of spiritual testament at a moment when he feared for his own life or for the life of his brother Fulgentius, whom Leander had sent to his native land. Consequently, scholars have proposed a range of dates between 579 and 587, while Leander was in Constantinople.[88]

6.2 In laudem ecclesiae / De triumpho Ecclesiae ob conuersione Gothorum

As mentioned above, Leander delivered the closing homily at the Third Council of Toledo in 589. The sermon, which has been transmitted in the minutes of the council, is known as In laudem ecclesiae or Sermon on the Triumph of the Church for the conversion of the Goths.[89] This homily is a literary masterpiece in which Leander displays his command of rhetoric. It shows, furthermore, his excellent linguistic, literary, and religious formation. The sermon is a complex text full of biblical and Patristic citations. A thorough reading of the text reveals [87] The transmission of the text is very corrupt, which makes its study and translation very difficult. See Ángel Custodio Vega, "El De institutione virginum de San Leandro de Sevilla con diez capítulos y medio inéditos," La Ciudad de Dios 159 (1947), 277–394, José Madoz, "Una nueva transmisión del Libellus de institutione virginum de San Leandro de Sevilla," Analecta Bollandiana 67 (1949), 407–24. Martyn, Saint Leander, thinks the original version is 21 chapters, not 31, and that the ten of the long version were a later addition. In consequence, he only uses 21 chapters in his English translation of the text.

[88] It has been proposed that this treatise was written sometime before Hermenegild's rebellion, during Leander's stay in Constantinople, when Hermenegild was defeated and Leander came back to the Iberian Peninsula or at the beginning of Reccared's reign. On the dates, see Domínguez del Val, Leandro de Sevilla, 123–26, and Fontaine and Cazier, "Qui a chassé de Carthaginoise," 393–95.

[89] For the text, Martínez Díez and Rodríguez, La colección canónica hispana, 5:148–59. English translations by Martyn, Saint Leander, 135–49, and Barlow, Iberian Fathers, 229–37. It is worth noting that in his De viris illustribus Isidore does not mention this homily among the works of his brother; see Navarra, "Interventi di Leandro di Siviglia," 124, n. 4. This fact, together with other evidence, has led to some scholars to deny that it was written by Leander.

the difficult negotiations between monarchy and episcopacy that took place before the conversion and attainment of unity, admonishing the king for taking credit for a conversion that properly belongs to Christ and his church.[90] The attribution to Leander of other parts of acts of the Third Council of Toledo, such as its liturgical, dogmatic, and disciplinary innovations, the anathemas, some canons, and in particular the Tomus, has not been substantiated satisfactorily.[91]

6.3 Anti-Arian Writings

According to Isidore, during his exile Leander wrote "Two books against the beliefs of the heretics" ("Duos aduersus haereticorum dogmata libros") and a "Pamphlet against Arian teachings" ("Opusculum aduersus instituta arrianorum"). In the two books against heretics Leander refuted the errors of the Arian heresy and corrected them through the doctrine of the Catholic Church, with a vehement style and very rich biblical erudition. The opusculum was written in the form of answers to Arian statements

> For here in the wanderings of his exile he composed two books against the beliefs of the heretics, richly endowed with the learning of the Holy Scriptures. In them he impaled in a vigorous style the impiety of the Arians, laying bare their depravity. For he revealed how the Catholic Church differed from them and how far they had departed from religion and the sacraments of the Faith. His admirable pamphlet against the teachings of the Arians also survives in which he sets out his replies to their beliefs
> (Hic namque in exilii sui peregrinatione composuit duos adversus haereticorum dogmata libros, eruditione sacrarum scripturarum ditissimos, in quibus vehementi stilo arrianae impietatis confodit ac detegit pravitatem; ostendens scilicet, quid contra eosdem habeat catholica ecclesia vel quantum distet ab eis religione vel fidei sacramentis. Extat et laudabile

---

[90] According to Gómez Cobo, La Homelia in laude Ecclesiae, the Patristic influence and knowledge which appears in this work, mainly derived from Ambrose, Gregory the Great, Cassiodorus, and Augustine, was acquired by Leander from his friend Gregory the Great. For an analysis of the homily, see also Jacques Fontaine, "La homilía de San Leandro ante el Concilio III de Toledo: temática y forma," in Concilio III de Toledo, 249–69, and José Orlandis, "La doctrina eclesiológica de la homilía de San Leandro en el Concilio III de Toledo," in Estudios de historia eclesiástica visigoda (Pamplona: 1998), 123–28.

[91] Gómez Cobo, La Homelia in laude Ecclesiae, however, argues that the documents related to the king in the council would not be the work of Leander, but of other ecclesiastical figures closer to Reccared's circle. See also Manuel Díaz, "Los discursos del rey Recaredo."

> eius opusculum adversus instituta arrianorum, in quo propositis eorum dictis, suas reponsiones opponit).[92]

These three Anti-Arian works were presumably composed in response to the religious policies of Leovigild, which, as we saw above, proved attractive to some Catholic bishops. Leander's writings asserted the truth of Catholic doctrine and the errors of the Arians. It seems that other ecclesiastics from the Spanish Catholic Church also contributed to discrediting Arianism, especially as it was reimagined by Leovigild in the early 580s.[93] Justinian and Eutropius of Valencia and Severus of Malaga are all recorded as having written anti-Arian tracts in the sixth century.[94] However, none of these anti-Arian writings, including those of Leander, is extant. Perhaps this was part of a kind of pact of silence made by contemporaries as they celebrated the conversion and the achievements of Reccared in the aftermath of the Third Council of Toledo in 589.[95]

6.4 Letters

Leander also wrote numerous letters. Isidore mentions two of them specifically: "To Pope Gregory concerning one baptism" and "To his brother in which he advises that no-one should fear Death" ("Ad Papam Gregorium de baptismate unam" and "Ad fratrem in qua praemonet, cuiquam mortem non esse timendam").[96] Although neither of these letters has survived, we can deduce part of the content of the one sent to Gregory from Gregory's response, dated to 591. This suggests that in his letter Leander had asked Gregory for advice on the controversial issue of baptism in the Spanish Church.[97] It seems that, due to various practices and theological disagreements on baptism between Catholics and former Arians, some churches practised triple immersion and others single immersion and that this had created some confusion and controversy within the Spanish Church. Thus, former Arians with the support of some Catholics defended triple immersion, while other Catholics were in favour of single immersion. Both stances were justified theologically, and advocates of one position refused to accept the validity of the other. It was a subject on which the apostolic see had been consulted before, namely in 538 in a letter sent by Profuturus of Braga to Pope Vigilius.[98] Gregory replied to Leander that although both of these positions were correct, the best way to avoid misunderstandings with new Arian converts was to only use single immersion.[99] This issue, however, continued to cause sharp disagreements for decades, as canon six of the Fourth Council of Toledo of 633 reveals.[100]

[93] The debates between Arians and Catholics, very well represented in the Iberian Peninsula during the 4th century by Osius of Cordoba, had acquired a new vigour in Leander's time, especially as a consequence of the arrival to the Iberian Peninsula of ecclesiastics and monks from North Africa, who brought with them writings and polemical style developed during disputes between Arian Vandals and Catholics, as well as during the Three Chapters controversy. Scholars discuss which brother was the addressee of Leander's second letter, "Ad fratrem in qua praemonet, cuiquam mortem non esse timendam." Some argue that it was Fulgentius, who was in danger in foreign territory, while others suggest that it was Isidore, who was threatened by Leovigild's siege of Seville of 583–584.[101] Isidore also says that Leander wrote very affectionate personal letters to his fellow bishops. He adds that although the form of these letters was not brilliant, they were full of firmness in thought.[102] None of these letters has survived.

6.5 Liturgical Writings

In the biography of his brother, Isidore records that Leander wrote a collection of prayers for the Psalter and composed numerous and heartfelt melodies for the Mass, hymns, and psalms.[103] Some scholars have suggested that some of Leander's liturgical production and ideas regarding Arianism could have been preserved in the anonymous Mozarabic Liber psalmographus and in Mozarabic literature more generally, which have reached us in manuscripts dated from the 8th to the 11th centuries.[104]

6.6 Other Works

The Hispana, a collection of papal decretals and records of church councils from the East, Africa, Gaul, and Spain, the first composition of which is attributed to Isidore, was, for Manuel Díaz, a work of Leander not of Isidore.[105] Although most scholars refute this hypothesis, some agree that it was probably first put together during Leander's episcopate.[106] The attribution to Leander of the Sermon for the feast of St. Vincent martyr (Sermo in solemniis sancti Vicentii martyris) also lacks solid foundations and is not generally accepted by scholars.[107]

7 Conclusion

When Leander died, sometime around 600–601, his brother Isidore not only became bishop of Seville and metropolitan of Baetica, but he also curated Leander's legacy. This legacy is vital to understanding Isidore's achievements.[108] Leander's words to his sister Florentina suggest that he had great affection for Isidore. Their parents had entrusted him with the education of his youngest brother, and it seems that Leander took this task seriously.[109] Isidore had at his disposal the very well-stocked episcopal library of Seville, which Leander had enriched with works by Gregory the Great and other eminent authors.[110] The intellectual and theological influence of Leander on his brother is evidenced by some similarities between their monastic rules.[111] Leander, furthermore, probably encouraged Isidore to write some of his most notable works, like On the Offices of the Church, and Isidore probably continued some projects initiated by his brother, such as the collection of papal decretals and records of church councils contained in the Hispana.[112]

Due to his close association with Leander, Isidore would have first-hand experience of many of the facets of episcopal office and it is likely that he was present at some of the crucial moments in the episcopacy of Leander. Leander also likely provided Isidore with connections to outstanding ecclesiastical and political figures of his time.[113] Due to all of these contexts, Isidore would carry on the policy of close collaboration between monarchy and episcopacy initiated by his brother, working for the Visigothic kingdom and its Church, and generating the ideological foundations that justified their close collaboration.[114]

The undoubted close association between Leander and Isidore contrasts with the laconic references Isidore dedicates to his brother in his own writings. In Isidore's writings, much of Leander's prominent political activity is not mentioned. Isidore's silence and his attempt to obscure his brother's role in the turbulent recent past are not, however, an impediment to appreciating Leander's contemporary importance and the profound influence that he had on the establishment of a united Catholic Visigothic kingdom and on his brother's intellection and pastoral formation.

[110] Isidore refers to Gregory the Great at Versus 14 and De viris illustribus 27, where he mentions Gregory's Regula Pastoralis, which the pope had sent to Leander (Gregory the Great, Epistola 5.53).

[111] See Campos and Roca, Reglas monásticas, 46 and 425–27.

[112] Martyn, Saint Leander, 12, Díaz y Díaz, "Pequeñas aportaciones," and Domínguez del Val, Leandro de Sevilla, 106–09.

[113] The connections of Leander were extensive, including Gregory the Great, Reccared, and other important ecclesiastics from across the Iberian Peninsula, such as Licinianus of Cartagena.

[114] Garcia Moreno, "La Andalucía de San Isidoro," 579, points out that Isidore, however, did not reach the outstanding political role of his brother in the Visigothic kingdom, maybe because he was too young for these affairs when he became bishop.

PART 2

Themes in Isidore's Works

CHAPTER 5

Isidore of Seville as a Theologian

Thomas O'Loughlin

1 Introduction: The Appropriateness of the Notion of "Theologian" as a Unifying Concept over the Range of the corpus Isidorianum

If we seek to find a unifying factor in the vast literary output of Isidore, bishop of Seville, then the modern designation of "theologian"—someone who seeks to articulate a vision of the universe, human history, and human aspirations from within a specific religious tradition—probably comes closest. It is a title that he would not have recognised, for it presumes the division of knowledge by way of university faculties that arose centuries later, but it will be used in this chapter as the term that allows us to see common themes running throughout his work as well as to appreciate some of his more specific contributions to the Western intellectual tradition.[1] Isidore himself would possibly have preferred some term akin to magister: the person who took on the educational tasks set out by Augustine (354–430) as necessary for the church in his De doctrina Christiana. Alternatively, given Isidore's attitude to the "fathers" whose wisdom he arranged in convenient textbook style, perhaps he would have wanted to describe himself as a discipulus to the magistri.[2] However, in that he sought to comprehend and codify the Christian inheritance, resolve its problems, and then communicate it effectively—especially in a school setting—he is truly a theologian, and possibly the first Latin writer who consciously adopted that attitude to the tradition he had received that we see in its fullest form with writers such as Abelard (1079–1142/3) in his Sic et non and Hugh of Saint-Victor (d. 1142) in his Didascalicon.

[1] Isidore does, of course, refer to theologi in the Etymologiae, but these are specific groups of pagan thinkers rather than individuals performing a specific task within the Christian church. At 8.6.18 the theologi are those Greek philosophers who wrote about God and about the nature of the divine, such as Dionysius the Stoic, or (at 8.7.9) those poets who wrote songs about the gods.

[2] One need but look at the apparatus fontium in any modern edition of his works to see how he sought to identify and combine what he imagined as the quotations from the fathers on particular texts or questions and thus form an authoritative resource for those who came after him. On Isidore's sense of being but the most recent moment in a tradition, the disciple of those older writers who taught with authority, see Thomas O'Loughlin, Teachers and Code-Breakers: The Latin Genesis Tradition, 430–800 (Turnhout: 1999), 157–205.

However, while it is arguable that Isidore was a major influence on the form of subsequent theology in the West, it is certain that he does not belong to the West's own perception of its theological history because he is not seen as a theological genius, as is the case with Augustine, or a technical master, such as Jerome (c.345–420), or a profound influence on Western spirituality, such as John Cassian (c.360-after 430). So, can we see Isidore as having been in any way innovative or creative theologically? A few decades ago the answer would have been a clear "no"—only those with significant and recognisably different ideas could enter the canon of "important Latin theologians". In this view the first figure worthy of attention after Augustine was Anselm (c.1033–1109), with occasional claims for either Boethius (c.480–c.524) and/or Eriugena (mid-9th century), and, perhaps, Bede (c.673–735). Figures such Cassiodorus (490–c.580), Isidore, and any number of other writers were relegated to a lesser league of "writers" (rather than "thinkers") who are merely of interest to medievalists and historians of the transmission of European culture. Ironically, this still common neglect might have pleased some of these writers in that one of their expressed aims was that they would hand on their inheritance without innovation; but in the very means by which they sought not to innovate, they innovated.[3] The contemporary rationale for looking at Isidore as a creative theologian owes its origin to the awareness that no cultural message can be isolated as some ideal essence—an "idea" or a set of ideas—apart from its medium within specific human societies. It was commonplace among theologians in the early part of the 20th century to imagine theology as a set of true propositions, which had a particular shape only accidentally, that were true ahistorically, although they might not have been known at particular times or in certain places or to some individuals. In such a view the only appropriate question one could ask of Isidore, as a theological writer, was whether or not he provided evidence for the presence in his time of some controverted proposition: if he did, then that was to the good, while if he were "silent" on a particular matter then that was interpreted as simply a gap in his knowledge.[4] This approach was sometimes summed up in the notion that "theology has no history, only heresy [the result of deviant human action and innovation] has a history"—and, as we shall see, Isidore held a not dissimilar view.

[3] O'Loughlin, Teachers and Code-Breakers, 273–96.

[4] There is archetypal example of this in the treatment of Isidore in relation to the post-Tridentine Catholic teaching on the Eucharist in Juan Solano, ed., Textos Eucaristicos Primitivos, vol. 2: Hasta el fin de la época patrística (Madrid: 1952), 695–708. Solano assembles quotations from six works and presents them as being in perfect harmony with the earliest times and the most recent doctrinal statements: one can chart continuities while the changes of culture, ritual, or theology are all but invisible.

Since the mid-20th century it has become increasingly common to recognise that the forms any cultural communication takes, and the values underlying it, are part of what is communicated; indeed, they may be more important than the formal information transmitted. Medium cannot be detached from "message," nor can a message be translated from one medium to another without the transformation of the message in that it now belongs within a different world. This development in semiotics has major implications for the history of theology because it is now recognised that the values that are implicit in the media and manner of doing theology not only shape the formulation of the message but function as the users' fundamental theological assumptions, and, in particular, the forms of communication usually are a close reflection of their understanding of the nature of revelation. So, for example, the storytelling form of the gospels highlights a narrative approach to revelation, the forensic disputes of the scholastics give a dominant place to the categorical proposition as the locus of religious truth such that revelation can be contained in propositions and faith is seen as assent to these, while the desire to provide structures for the arrangement of knowledge and compendia for its transmission reveal Isidore's notion of Christianity as an all-embracing system where every question can be answered with clarity and certainty. In being the first to present theological knowledge in this form, Isidore can be seen as one of the most significant theologians in the aftermath of the Roman Empire and one whose style of theology survived, in many places, until the 20th century. It is from this perspective on Isidore as an innovator—not of the "content" of doctrine but of how the nature of doctrine was conceived, how it could approached in the activity of teaching, and how "pieces" of doctrine could be assembled and used in larger arguments—that his status as a theologian should be evaluated.

2 Isidore's View of What a Good Theologian Should Be

Although Isidore did not produce works that explicitly reflect on what a Christian teacher does or should be doing,[5] we can see, indirectly, what he valued in theological teachers in his comments in his De viris illustribus.[6] In contrast to his exemplars in the genre, such as Jerome's book of the same title, Isidore's work rarely acts as a bibliography; he is more interested in teachers who have had an effect within the church's ambit than those who produced books. We see this in a simple analysis of those included: 27 bishops, 2 priests, 1 abbot, and 3 laypeople (one a woman). Teaching is perceived and presented as being a function of being an office holder in the church, pre-eminently the work of a bishop, rather than a function of individual genius, inspiration, or creativity.[7] Indeed, Isidore is more interested in the writers as saintly churchmen than as Christian writers per se; and given the tone of the book it would have been inconceivable to him that he could have included, as Jerome did, writers who were not orthodox Christians. While Isidore tells us the general area of each writer's work, on only a handful of cases can we identify the specific text being referenced and in even fewer cases is the title of the work included in his description. The inference seems clear: theology is a corpus of agreed knowledge embraced by individuals and transmitted rather than being a constellation of brilliant books by outstanding individuals.[8] There are certain recurring themes in entries. The most common is that the writer had opposed heresy, or a particular heresy, in some way, and there are two identifiable concerns under this broad heading. Firstly, a concern with those involved in reacting to what he saw as the web of Arianism, presented as denying the divinity of Jesus, which beset the church and led innocent people astray; and, secondly, the heresies which Isidore linked to those who queried various practices relating to baptism: the ideal church was to be uniform not only in teaching but in its practices. The second identifiable concern is with biblical exegesis where one bishop wrote on one topic and someone else on another – and we can presume that eventually we should have a complete set of commentaries; and, thirdly, a concern with penance and monastic practice. The predominant motif is that the Christian writer, a bishop, is one who must counter false teaching and defective practice. There is a tacit assumption that theology and orthodoxy are interchangeable terms, and that theology as such is a single integral and entire edifice. All teachers, whether in Greek or Latin, whether recent (such as Maximus of Zaragoza—the last writer mentioned—who writes in Visigothic Spain) or in the past (Hosius of Cordoba—the first entry), are proclaiming the exact same doctrine. Within this edifice of teaching there are no disputes between equally legitimate approaches or positions, nor are there any novelties: disagreements, over such matters as baptism or celebrating Easter, are the result of ignorance or weakness, and these problems are resolved by teachers who write clear answers to the problems. Likewise with exegesis, there is no hint that there are better or worse commentaries on particular books, but there are writers who address this or that text (Justus on the Song of Songs, Gregory the Great on Job) and thus provided the information that is needed. The various writers are conceivable as simply contributors to an encyclopaedia of theological truth that is at all times consistent, coherent, and potentially complete (some details may still need to be written up). So just as the only new work that has been noted in the De viris illustribus has been responses to threatening novelties (novelties, threats, heresies being also interchangeable terms), this is the only new work that will be required from teachers; for the most part they are to repeat and clarify a wholly known depositum.

[5] It is significant that in Isidore's list of ecclesial actors dealt with in De ecclesiasticis officiis 2 there is no mention of a teacher or of a preacher, and that the act of teaching and having knowledge in relation to the scriptures ("scientia scripturarum necessaria est") is just one item among the duties of the bishop (2.5.16).

[7] The ideal teachers of the De viris illustribus mirror exactly the ideal bishop in De ecclesiaasticis officiis 2.5.13–17; indeed, one can view the De viris illustribus as Isidore writing for his fellow bishops on the doctrinal dimension of their duties using the form of "history being theology teaching by example."

[8] It is interesting that Isidore never quotes Dan. 12:3—comparing teachers to brilliant stars in the heavens—and the only possible allusion to it (it may be to Phil. 2:15) interprets the stars of heaven "as, spiritually, the church which shines in the night of this life" (Isidore, De natura rerum 12.1). The collectivity, the church, is so much more significant than the actual teachers who compose it. See also: Jamie Wood, "Elites and Baptism: Religious 'Strategies of Distinction' in Visigothic Spain," in Elite and Popular Religion, eds. Kate Cooper and Jeremy Gregory (Woodbridge: 2006), 3–17.

3 A Theologian at Work

We see Isidore's belief that all the orthodox teachers expound the same doctrine, and so must be virtually in complete harmony with one another, in the way he approached scriptural exegesis. Exegesis, when allegorical methods predominate, is by its nature pluriform: having found one meaning, one can then find another, and the process has no natural termination. Hence we have "the forest of interpretations"[9] from early Christian writers with many exegeses of individual texts. Such open-endedness was not to Isidore's taste, with his desire for ordered teaching and fixed concise answers. We shall look at his theoretical answer to this issue when we look at how he attempted to create a systematic net for knowledge, but he also evolved a practical answer to it in his biblical commentaries.

No biblical book posed as many problems to the Christian theologians as Genesis, so this is the example to be examined here.[10] On one side it presented a history of the earth and humanity that contradicted that of Greco-Roman culture, while its account of human disobedience (both in Eden and before the flood) was often seen as the background to christology and the nature of Christian life. Isidore's work was to reduce the vast variety of material on this text—nearly half a dozen different commentaries from Augustine alone—to a fixed set of exegeses drawn from his authorities.[11] Viewed in terms of his sources, his commentary on Genesis is a chain of quotations (principally from Augustine, then from Ambrose (*c.*339–97) and Jerome, and then from other authors) with very few comments of his own.[12] Where he innovates is to divide the text into small units—sometimes this is a narrative unit and sometimes just a sentence—which are identified by lemmata in the commentary, and then to each such unit attach a snippet from his authorities. So the catena of events/statements in Genesis (A, B, C, D, E …) is paralleled by a catena of interpretations (a, b, c, d, e …) such that these are imagined as linked pairs (Aa, Bb, Cc, Dd, Ee …); and the unity and consistency of the biblical text is matched by the unity and consistency of the commentators used: the authorities by appearing not to conflict with one another convey to the reader the impression that the biblical text is itself unproblematic.[13] This method contained within it two hermeneutical implications that would have a profound effect on subsequent Latin exegesis and theology. First, that the biblical text, and indeed the whole of revelation, could be conceived as a set of interconnected propositions—susceptible to analysis as propositions and to being used in theological speculation as propositions such that any conclusion that resulted in a non-contradictory set of propositions was itself part of the depositum fidei—and secondly, that it was possible to hold that there was a single true interpretation of any passage of scripture, and so of the whole Bible, which could be ascertained by the ecclesial body of teachers (such as those bishops listed in the De viris illustribus). Isidore never explicitly embraced either of these implications of his method, but he probably grasped them in some inchoate way, and certainly he would not have been averse to them. That these implications were soon drawn out as basic elements in theology can be seen by those who came after and used Isidore, such as Julian of Toledo (fl. 667–90).[14]

Readers today view Isidore's writings on natural philosophy (e.g. De natura rerum) mainly as forming the basis of medieval science, but within Isidore's vision these works set out the background to the key doctrines of Christian belief.[15] But what is not apparent in them is the extent to which Isidore took differing solutions from earlier Christian writers and combined them to form a single position. The issue of whether or not there are "waters above the heavens" (Gen. 1:6–7) is a convenient example. On the one hand, the Bible is explicit that these waters exist, while on the other hand both classical cosmology and its underlying physics, that matter is arranged in the universe by weight, entertain no such notion. This conflict was complemented by another between Ambrose and Augustine on how to approach the problem where we find Augustine criticising and rejecting Ambrose's approach, albeit without naming his teacher.[16] Isidore not only ignored the classical–biblical conflict by presenting the biblical position as simply the "known facts," but combined conflicting elements from both Ambrose's and Augustine's answers to the problem as if they were consistent.[17] A parallel to this can be found in Isidore's treatment of the chronology of the first age of creation. There is no hint of Christians' embarrassment at their relatively short history of creation, and the biblically derived chronology is given as the only sequence of true dates. When he knows that there is a famous problem in his sources he adopts an attitude of simple declaration. So, for example, the problem relating to Methuselah's death (Gen. 5:25) after the flood—a conflict between the Greek and Hebrew/Vulgate texts—is mentioned without explanation,[18] and the problematic implication is then simply rejected:

> Enoch … gave birth to Methuselah, who is found to have lived, according to the series of years, for fourteen years after [the coming of] the flood. That is why there are some who have the false opinion (falsa opinione > existimant) that he, along with his father Enoch who was "removed" (translatus), survived for a little while until the flood has passed by.[19]

By labelling problems as the results of false opinions, Isidore isolates the sacred text from the sphere of argument: the text itself is not problematic; the difficulties belong to the sphere of the human readers. When they have generated questions which could be seen as impinging on the text's credibility, then it is the readers who are at fault, and their questions and doubts can be marginalised as "false opinion." Just as Isidore's method of presenting exegesis can be seen as a key moment in the development of the propositional model of theology and of the logical model of theological development, his combination of human sciences (be that cosmology or history) with the biblical narratives can be seen as a major contributor to the related notions of the sufficiency of sacred text as a product of literal inspiration and of the inerrancy of the text both as a whole, and in its most simple detail where these could be expressed as propositions.

Isidore did not leave any treatise of these basic issues, but in the way he embedded these theological perspectives in a series of works which became core texts in teaching theology for the centuries after him, he can be said to have originated many of the basic principles both of systematic theology and of how the scriptures were approached theologically in the West until the 18th century. Viewed from this perspective, Isidore's many handbooks, such as the De ortu et obitu patrum[20] or the In libros veteris ac novi testamenti prooemia,[21] should be considered as much works conveying his theological vision as being handy repositories of curious knowledge. These are not just teachers' texts, synopses, and enchiridia, but distillations of the complexity of the inheritance; indeed, since Isidore has presented the conclusions of this library with

The notion of Enoch being "removed" is based on the text of Gen. 5:24 that "God took him" and, as Isidore refers to it, in terms of his not dying or being destroyed by the flood using the phrase translatus [est], we see the influence of Heb. 11:5: "Enoch was removed (translatus est) […] lest he see death" and Sir. 44:15: "Enoch pleased God and was removed (translatus est) into paradise." brevitas, to an extent his synopses can replace the books of ancients: the compendium (literally: a short cut) bypasses the very ancients whose writing have authority and deserve respect!

Reading a work like the Prooemia one is not given a mere one-paragraph introduction, and we know that it was read in this way from the manner in which it was excerpted in biblical codices, but a particular viewpoint for locating anything further that might be read. Moreover, in many cases, since one knows the answer to the problem, the speculation that led up to that position can now be considered redundant.[22] Why, for example, should one read the long discourses on the "waters above" in Ambrose's Exameron or the very complex treatment of the topic in Augustine's De Genesi ad litteram when all around are agreed about the frame of the universe, and the most valuable insights from each of those great saints have been arranged under the correct lemma in Isidore's commentary?[23] Isidore's textbooks witness his great skill as an assembler of information, his admiration for such qualities as brevitas,[24] and his awareness of the scholastic needs of post-Roman Europe, but they also witness his deeper convictions about the integrity and completeness of Christian knowledge. He, the Christian bishop, is the ideal reader of any book, pagan or Christian, and so can fit it perfectly into an overall arrangement of knowledge in which God has revealed all that is needed for salvation—and all the propositions that are needed for knowledge. As salvation is complete, so is the sum of human knowing.[25] In this view, theological knowledge both wraps up all other disciplines and becomes the meta-discipline: it knows the limits and possibilities of knowing.

4 The Sacerdotal Dimension of the Christian Teacher's Work

In all his work of compiling, summarising, and packaging, Isidore never expresses a doubt that the Christian understanding of creation, his theology, can be adequately transmitted in textbooks, and this silence, in one who had available to him an extensive library, is itself a basic premise of his theology. This attitude supposes not only that there is a dominant intellectual paradigm—to use the language of Thomas Kuhn[26]—where it is only details that need to be resolved, but that most if not all the problems have been resolved. Knowledge is not only coherent within their religious system, but also virtually complete. This perspective sets Isidore apart from his great sources: Augustine, for example, knew that there were competing visions of the creation and human history, as we see in his De civitate Dei, and that the solutions of today will be inadequate for tomorrow, as we see in his returning to subjects over his lifetime until his final Retractationes. Isidore had no such need: at best one could convey the material in a more fluent form, but for the most part where we do find him addressing an issue on several occasions, what we find are repetitions. When this sense of satisfaction with the paradigm is combined with his respect for the truth as given by the auctoritates, located within a view of Christian writing that amounts to a sense of the corporate personality of the Christian schoolmaster,[27] it seemed an obvious conclusion that the work of theology was complete. This notion would become a commonplace in later Latin theology when it was expressed in such formulae as "scripture is all sufficient" or "revelation ended with the death of the last apostle"—and it would be only in the 19th century that its inadequacy as a position would be tentatively broached within Christian theology—but Isidore is probably the first Latin writer who took it as axiomatic. So, would there be need for more Christian writers? Isidore would have to answer positively: there would be new confusions due to human weakness and sin, there would be the survival of false opinions, and, presumably, there might be even more concise textbooks.

[25] This aspect of Isidore's activity as an encyclopaedist was noted long ago in Ernest Brehaut's An Encyclopedist of the Dark Ages: Isidore of Seville (New York: 1912) but is often forgotten in the desire to note Isidore's sources on the one hand and his influence on the other.

However, there was a deeper and darker reason why theologians would be needed: Christian teaching—even in those matters we would imagine as "secular"—did not operate in a neutral space where there were simply teachers and pupils. Just as the divine Spirit brought illumination to the darkness of the human mind, so were there evil spiritual forces constantly working against true doctrine. Wandering in the lower atmosphere were the demons, condemned to be there until the Day of Judgement, and they are ruled by the Devil/Satan.[28] Their constant activity is to counter the virtues in human beings that lead to holiness. Therefore, humans in their pursuit of the truth are engaged in a warfare with them—for Isidore takes for granted that they are children of "the Liar," the "enemy of truth" (veritatis inimicus).[29] Human confusions and false opinions can be attributed to this demonic source, and it is part of the work of the Christian priest to lead the faithful in this battle.[30] Moreover, since Satan is the Antichrist, he makes opposing the mysteries of the Christ (sacramenta Christi), which it is the teachers' task to expound, his special concern. It is he, the Antichrist, that denies the divinity of the Christ,[31] and so Isidore assumes his readers will realise that it is this Evil One who is behind all the various christological heresies. In the De viris illustribus this had been one of the themes that characterised the eminent teachers; and we now see that this was not simply a tribute to their adherence to an orthodoxy but a demonstration that bishops/theologians were involved intimately in the drama of salvation. The theologian as the Christian of intellectual prowess is a notion that Isidore can barely imagine, but he has a clear view of the sacerdotal role of the theologian in opposing the attacks of the Devil, and this elevates the status of the teacher into the very structure not only of the Church but of creation.[32] Viewed in this light, the teacher's role with regard to knowledge and teaching is very close to that of the bishop, and this needs to be borne in mind when we distinguish between "secular" and "sacred" in Isidore's oeuvre: whether looking at pagan learning or biblical books, whether dealing with material objects or mysteries, the theologically alert teacher would be needed to ensure that the truth was enunciated, but also, perhaps more crucially, to fend off the attacks of The Tempter on the innocent.[33]

5 Isidore and the Framework of Western Theology

Even a cursory reading of Isidore shows him to be a redactor of authorities: item after item, from this source and that, placed in sequence and justified, as he sometimes remarked, by his appeal "to the writings of the men of old and especially the catholic writers."[34] Isidore's own desire not to be seen as an innovator matches our modern description of him as lacking in originality. Isidore's own writing is then presented with images such as the mortar between the bricks:[35] he may the formal source of some later medieval writer's position, but for the genuine source of an idea we have to look behind him. This is certainly true if one conceives the history of ideas as tracking some notion back to its earliest expression, but it runs the danger of not recognising that knowledge, particularly religious knowledge where shared story is central, always exists within a social construction and is in continual evolution. So, the question should be framed: how important is Isidore's theological input if, instead of imagining his own work as "mortar," we think of it as the steel skeleton of the edifice of Christian knowledge? This, the structure of the Christian intellectual world, was an issue that Isidore addressed in several of his writings, and his solutions were adopted, with little alteration if often with some confusion, by his successors.[36]

The teacher, knowing that truth had to be attained and falsehood avoided, was faced with a mass of material, all of which was conveyed in language: if this could be arranged in order, then the pupil could progress. Isidore sets out a scheme for this when he addresses the difference between wisdom (sapientia) and knowledge (scientia).[37] What he produces is a structure that can locate all that is known both about the creation and the Creator within a single pathway with wisdom as its destination, which he defines as "the contemplation of eternal realities", for a life lived "before the eyes of God". It can be arranged in tabular form thus:

	Physics—	Seven Arts
W
I		Justice	Divine Truth
S	Ethics—	Prudence		Historical sense
D		Fortitude	Scripture	"Middle" sense
O		Temperance		Spiritual sense
M
	Logic—	Dialectic &c

[35] Various images have been used, but this image of mortar is that employed by Macfarlane, "Isidore of Seville on the Pagan Gods," 4: "[Isidore] contributes little more than the mortar which connects excerpts from other authors."

[36] One can still see its influence in such work as the De reductione atrium ad theologiam by Bonaventure (*c.*1217–1274).

[37] Isidore, De differentiis verborum 2.39.148–158.

While each element in this structure is inherited, the simplicity with which they are brought together and aligned with each other is Isidore's; and, moreover, it expresses the core of his theology of creation. Just as the whole of the creation forms a unity in its dependence on God, so is that unity reflected in the human pursuit of wisdom. While humans could be content with a mere assemblage of facts (scientia), the intended end of knowing is the wholeness of the creation and its relationship to God. Implicit in this is the assumption that wisdom and truth cannot be separated, and that the truth is itself a unity—no true expression can contradict any other expression—and that unity is inherent within human knowing and not simply as a result of a true knowledge of God. By linking the structures of creation and knowing in this way he pioneered not only the scholastic method with its reliance on the transcendental unity of truth, but also a very positive view of the creation as we find it (indeed a theology of creation's goodness which, if fully spelled out, might have held as suspect).

That Isidore's position on the creation/human knowing in the De differentiis verborum was not just the passing thought of a moment but his considered position can be seen in the overall structure we find in the Etymologiae,[38] and also in the way he, firstly, links various human disciplines with the structures of revelation found in the scriptures in that work, and then, secondly, links the ways of knowing with the ends of human life. He links human wisdom (and so its study) with the scriptures (and so exegesis) in Etymologiae 2.24.3–8 thus:

Natural	Physics	Thales	The Material Causes	Genesis & Qoheleth
Moral	Ethics	Socrates	Human life	Proverbs, &c
Rational	Logic	Plato	The Higher Causes	The Song of Songs & the gospels

Isidore then considers how the values of knowing as valued within Christian learning—as that was conceived of within a monastic context in the aftermath of John Cassian—could be reconciled with the values of knowing found in human philosophy (Etymologiae 2.24.10–16). The relationship can be set out thusly:

[38] The actual division into books and chapters is somewhat arbitrary and the work of Braulio of Zaragoza; the more valuable division is that into subject areas, which is Isidore's own work.

Inspective Concerns invisible things, divine matters, and heavenly contemplation.	Natural[a]	The creation as it was intended by God.[b]
	Doctrinal	The quadrivium founded in the abstraction of number.[c]
	Divine	Concerns the ineffable nature of God; and matters relating to the spiritual creatures.[d]
Actual Presumably the opposite of the above: visible, material, and terrestrial things.	Moral[e]	Honest living and the virtues.[f]
	Domestic	The correct order of living in a household.[g]
	Civil	Life in the city.[h]

[a] This division is made at Etymologiae 2.24.10. It might be objected that this tabulation of Isidore's work is itself an interpretation of him, which it is, but that Isidore had an overarching view of these matters is confirmed by the fact that the whole is internally consistent and he never contradicts himself.

[b] Etymologiae 2.24.12.

[c] Etymologiae 2.24.10 and 14–15.

[d] Etymologiae 2.24.13.

[e] Etymologiae 2.24.11.

[f] Etymologiae 2.24.16.

[g] Etymologiae 2.24.16.

While in all these cases it is possible to dismiss Isidore's work as no more than that of creating a neat taxonomy—and it is neat and was appreciated as such by his successors—or that of creating a synthesis of words and appearances rather than seeking a fundamental theoretical reconciliation between Christian faith and human knowing, that would not only be unjust to Isidore's creativity within his understanding of how a Christian teacher should act, but it fails to recognise the inherent fecundity of this synthesis in terms of the Latin tradition. The scholar could draw in all human knowing into his theology, while seeing in the whole of creation and its history an apologetic and demonstration of Christian truth.

6 Conclusion: Isidore's Legacy

Given his literary productivity it is possible to ascertain, usually with a high degree of precision, Isidore's position on most theological topics that were under discussion in the Patristic period. There have been numerous studies of particular issues where he is usually studied as a moment in the movement from Augustine to the scholastics.[39] Usually these appear as a consensus of earlier disputes, and often they can be seen as the intermediate position between that found in an earlier and a later writer of note. However, by Isidore's reduction of inherently complex debates to simple categorical statements he often produced an extreme form which did a serious disservice to his sources. His Christology, for example, is so fascinated with the divinity of Christ that he presents the humanity of Jesus docetically,[40] while his doctrine of the Eucharist is so concerned with the notion of presence that it loses sight of the inherent ambiguity of the notion of a sacrament/mystery.[41]

Isidore always presents his material as settled knowledge, and he was taken at his word in that his works are usually the key to how a Patristic theme was modified to become a standard element in Western theology.[42] Equally, the extent of Isidore's impact can be ascertained by looking at the diffusion of his works, which we can measure by citations, references to him or his works, and the raw quantities of surviving manuscripts. But while these investigations are useful in understanding the development of Western thought, they should not deflect us from noting that it is Isidore's underlying assumptions about the nature of theology, expressed in text after text and reproduced in manuscript after manuscript, which are his major and most enduring legacy. Isidore described a world that lay wholly covered by a sacred mantle, and as such it is an enchanted universe. But it is also a rational space in that revelation could be known with clarity and expressed as propositions—his own actual lack of clarity notwithstanding—while contradictory evidence could be marginalised as curiosities surviving from the past or details just needing diligence to bring them to a coherent resolution. Theology—and revelation itself—was a matter of proposition calling for assent. In this ordered creation humans had about them the handiwork of the Creator and, if pious and attentive, could discover all its secrets and that "all wisdom is from the Lord" (Sir. 1:1). There was no need for any new information; indeed, there was no new information to be found, and the challenge that faced Isidore and his successors was to present and transmit it effectively. In relation to theological questions his pupils could be complacent—the answers were there—but at the same time they could not be complacent as Christians, for the Devil and his fallen angels were setting traps for them to lead them astray. The ideal theologian was a Christian sacerdos with a prodigious and organised memory: someone not unlike Isidore himself.

[39] There are a few topics where his position has become an almost mandatory footnote. The most famous case is his interpretation of predestination where he was the first to use the later famous, or infamous, term of "double predestination" (Isidore, Sententiae 2.6.1); see Jaroslav Pelikan, The Growth of Medieval Theology (600–1300) (Chicago: 1978), 88–89.

CHAPTER 6

Isidore of Seville as an Historian

Jamie Wood

1 Introduction

The fact that Isidore and his contemporaries in Visigothic Spain did not compose histories of significant length and detail has led many scholars to judge 6th- and 7th-century Spain as something of an historiographical wasteland.[1] For example, E.A. Thompson stated that Isidore: "could hardly have told us less, except by not writing at all".[2] Walter Goffart described Isidore as "almost distinguished enough" as an historian to be included in his quartet of "narrators of barbarian history".[3] Despite these less-than-positive appraisals of Visigothic-era historiography, the past was fundamental to how the people of Visigothic Spain understood their position in the world.[4] Aside from works of history-writing and hagiography, many of the documentary sources of the period, from the records of church councils to the efforts of kings to make and codify royal laws, were essentially backward-looking and involved the collation and reconfiguration of the knowledge of past times.[5] Knowledge of the past had to be deployed so that it could be made useful in the present and future.

This chapter seeks to move beyond the negative appraisals of Isidore as an historian by taking account of the full scope of his "historical" output. Scholars have long recognised that Isidore had a well-developed philosophy of history and that he aimed to elicit specific social responses when writing, especially in some of his more pastorally and theologically inclined works.[6] What is more, the fact that he rewrote his accounts of the past on multiple occasions has provided fertile ground for analysis of his practice as an author, including his use of sources, and the impact of changing religious and political contexts on his writing of history.[7] He wrote biographies that recounted (usually briefly) the lives, deeds, and writings of men—and a few women—who had played an important role in the recent and not-so-recent history of Christianity. He was also an enthusiastic recorder of etymologies, writings which charted the origins and histories of words. On many occasions the etymologies that Isidore offers also touch on important historical events and figures. The most clearly "historical" of Isidore's writings, however, were his narrative histories and chronicles.

In what follows, I begin by outlining Isidore's definition of history as a genre, focussing on his exposition of the origins and boundaries of the genre.[8] I then move on to review the full range of Isidore's historical output, from chronicles and histories to biographies and other writings that were organised historically, suggesting that such works, although written across a period of three decades and for a variety of purposes, were interlinked and thus can be considered as part of a coherent historiographical "project." The final section addresses the underpinning rationale for historical writing, which can be traced to Isidore's definition of history as a genre that served a moral purpose for the instruction of the present.

2 Isidore on History as a Genre

At the end of book 1 of his Etymologiae, "De grammatica," which provides definitions and derivations of the elements of grammar and speech, Isidore addresses the subject of history. After a definition of "historia," he moves on to discuss, in turn, the first authors of history, the usefulness of history, and the different kinds of history. While it can be problematic to contrast uncritically Isidore's theoretical writings about history with his historiographical output, the Etymologiae provides a clear definition of "history," an outline of origins of the literary genre and details of its internal and external boundaries. This can help us to better comprehend how such insights found expression in his writings.

In the first book of the Etymologiae Isidore defines history as a written project on a large scale.[9] In book 6, in the midst of a discussion about the names of different-sized books, he notes that "Histories were written in a larger size book".[10] Isidore was acutely aware of the different forms of historical writing and makes clear his awareness of the subdivisions within the genre:

> There are three kinds of history. The events of a single day are called an "ephemeris;" we call this a "diary." What the Romans call "daily," the Greeks call ephemeris. Histories that are distributed into individual months are called "calendars." Annals are the actions of individual years, for whatever domestic or military matters, on sea or land, worthy of memory are treated year by year in records they called "annals" from yearly deeds. But history concerns itself with many years or ages, and through the diligence of history annual records are reported in books. There is this difference between history and annals, namely, that history is of those times that we have seen, but annals are of those years that our age has not known. Whence Sallust consists of history, and Livy, Eusebius, and Jerome of annals and history.[11]

[11] "Genus historiae triplex est. Ephemeris namque appellatur unius diei gestio. Hoc apud nos diarium vocatur. Nam quod Latini diurnum, Graeci ephemerida dicunt. Kalendaria appellantur, quae in menses singulos digeruntur. Annales sunt res singulorum annorum. Quaequae enim digna memoriae domi militiaeque, mari ac terrae per annos in commentariis acta sunt, ab anniversariis gestis annales nominaverunt. Historia autem multorum annorum vel temporum est, cuius diligentia annui commentarii in libris delati sunt. Inter historiam autem et annales hoc interest, quod historia est eorum temporum quae vidimus, annales vero sunt eorum annorum quos aetas nostra non novit. Unde Sallustius ex historia, Livius, Eusebius et Hieronymus ex annalibus et historia constant," Isidore, Etymologiae 1.44, trans. Stephen A. Barney, W.J. Lewis, J.A. Beach, and Oliver Berghof, The Etymologies of Isidore of Seville (Cambridge: 2006), 67.

In the fifth book of the Etymologiae Isidore states that Eusebius compiled a "Chronicle," a Greek word for "succession [series] of times" in Greek, and that Jerome translated it into Latin.[12] Elsewhere, he notes a division between the historical accounts that were contained in scripture, histories of the church, and secular histories.[13] He also categorises history (historia) as "narrative," one of three elements of the Old and New Testaments, alongside "moral instruction" (mores) and "allegorical meaning" (allegoria).[14]

As with the references to Livy, Eusebius and Jerome above, and in common with the approach that underpins the Etymologiae as a whole, there is also a consistent emphasis on the origins of the genre.

> Among us Christians Moses was the first to write a history, on creation. But among the pagans, Dares the Phrygian was first to publish a history, on the Greeks and Trojans, which they say he wrote on palm leaves. After Dares, Herodotus is held as the first to write history in Greece. After him Pherecydes was renowned, at the time when Ezra wrote the law.[15]

At first sight, there does not seem to be much order to this list of Greek, Roman, Jewish, and Christian historians and annalists.[16] As he does throughout the Etymologiae, Isidore notes that different peoples have varying vocabulary for the subject under review, in this case the forms of historical writing. They also have different "national" historians. Isidore's attempt to claim Moses as a Christian perhaps echoes the ancient debate between the Jews and the pagan Greeks over the relative antiquity of Moses and Homer, thereby reaffirming Jewish and, by extension, Christian, primacy.[17]

Isidore also distinguishes between the forms and subject matter of historical genres. History is primarily narrative in form, one of its main distinguishing features being the units of time on which the narrative is based.[18] The subject matter of history is times that the narrator has seen, whereas annals describe times which the current age does not know:

Apud gentiles vero primus Dares Phrygius de Graecis et Troianis historiam edidit, quam in foliis palmarum ab eo conscriptam esse ferunt. Post Daretem autem in Graecia Herodotus historiam primus habitus est. Post quem Pherecydes claruit his temporibus quibus Esdras legem scripsit," Isidore, Etymologiae 1.42, trans. Barney et al., 67.

[16] Isidore was clearly concerned with defining the categories to which different authors belonged, making it clear that Lucan wrote history and not poetry, Etymologiae 8.7.10.

[17] At Etymologiae 6.2.1 Isidore again mentions Moses as a historian; de Carlos Villamarín, "Dares Frigio." Isidore's De ortu et obitu patrum, 60, 81 reinforced this point by referring to Esdras and Luke the evangelist as historians.

> And history, "plausible narration" and fable differ from one other. Histories are true deeds that have happened, plausible narrations are things that, even if they have not happened, nevertheless could happen, and fables are things that have not happened and cannot happen, because they are contrary to nature.[19]

The positioning of the chapter on "fable" (De fabula) immediately before the definition of history shows that the issue of veracity was important for Isidore: history should be truthful and plausible.[20] As we shall see later, this was due to the moral underpinning of the genre and the role that it was envisaged as playing in the instruction of the faithful; it also had to be useful.[21]

3 Isidore's Histories

3.1 Chronicles

In the past, Isidore's chronographic writings were denigrated as deficient versions of the past due to their relative lack of narrative detail and reliance on a limited number of sources.[22] In 2003 a new critical edition of the text established that there were two redactions of the Chronica Maiora, the longest version of the text: the first, written under King Sisebut in 615/616, and the second, completed under King Suinthila in 626. Isidore's Chronica Minora probably reached its final state in 626 and was officially published in 627/628 as part of the fifth book of the Etymologiae.[23] Scholars began to unpick the complex relationships between the different versions of the Chronica, its sources, and Isidore's other writings. In the process, they have challenged previous negative judgements of the work.[24]

[19] "Item inter historiam et argumentum et fabulam interesse. Nam historiae sunt res verae quae factae sunt; argumenta sunt quae etsi facta non sunt, fieri tamen possunt; fabulae vero sunt quae nec factae sunt nec fieri possunt, quia contra naturam sunt," Isidore, Etymologiae 1.44, trans. Barney et al., 67.

[20] Isidore, Etymologiae 1.40.

[22] For example, Roger Collins, "Isidore, Maximus, and the Historia Gothorum," in Historiographie im frühen Mittelalter, eds. Anton Scharer and Georg Scheibelreiter (Vienna: 1994), 354, describes the Chronicle as a "scissors and paste" composition derived largely from second-hand material and offering a deficient account of world history.

The Chronica Minora (Chapter 39 of book 5 of the Etymologiae) used to be viewed as little more than an epitome of the Chronica Maiora. While there is significant interdependence between the two texts, there are also differences. Some the manuscripts of the Chronica Minora can be characterised as "archetypes" between the first and second redactions of the Chronica Maiora, representing stages of epitomisation. The Chronica Minora therefore contains epitomised entries from both redactions of the longer text, alongside some information that is found in neither version of the Chronica Maiora. In addition, the Chronica Minora has an independent manuscript tradition compared to the Chronica Maiora and the Etymologiae, while at least one manuscript of the Etymologiae (Cesena, Biblioteca Comunale Malatestiana, S.XXI.5, late 8th/early 9th century, northern Italy) includes the Chronica Maiora rather than the Chronica Minora.[25] The Chronica Minora can therefore be seen as an independent work and not solely as a degraded version of the Chronica Maiora.[26]

Isidore made active use of late antique historical and chronographic sources to produce the chronicles.[27] There is a preference for Christian historians and chroniclers, with the Latin translation and continuation of Eusebius of Caesarea's Chronicon by Jerome (and his continuators; Victor of Tunnuna and John of Biclarum were notable sources from the mid-to-late sixth century) a favoured source. Isidore also used non-Christian histories. The abbreviated histories of Rome put together by Eutropius and others in the late 4th century were used with relative frequency. Often these sources were severely edited and combined with other historical and non-historical sources, such as Augustine's Civitas Dei, which provides one of the organising elements of the second redaction of Isidore's Chronica: the six ages of the world schema.[28] In places sources are summarised and augmented with Isidore's own authorial input, especially as he neared his own day.

Uitvlugt, "The sources of Isidore's commentaries on the Pentateuch," Revue Bénédictine 112 (2002), 72–73 and 93–94, makes a similar point about Isidore's use of sources in his commentaries on the Pentateuch.

Because nearly all of the sources used to compile the chronicles are extant it is possible to compare the historical information that Isidore had at his disposal (a huge amount) and what he chose to write down (a very small amount). In so doing, we can witness an early medieval historian making conscious decisions about his representation of the past. The exclusions are strikingly congruent with Isidore's explicit statements on particular topics elsewhere in his corpus. For example, positive references in earlier sources to the Roman emperors are often excluded, as is much of the negative information about the Visigoths. The material that Isidore excluded from his histories can thus tell us much about the imperatives that drove him to write (and rewrite) his accounts of the past.[29]

3.2 Narrative Histories

Isidore is unique among the historians of the early Middle Ages because he wrote narrative histories of three separate "barbarian" groups: the Visigoths, the Vandals, and the Sueves. In the process he constructed a work of "considerable originality" that "deserves more attention than it has received."[30] The text commonly known as the Historia Gothorum (History of the Goths) was not known as such initially. In a list of Isidore's writings produced shortly after Isidore's death, Braulio of Zaragoza described the text as "A single book on the origin of the Goths (de origine Gothorum) and the kingdom of the Sueves and the Vandals".[31] Given Isidore's interest in etymologies and origins in other works, it is not unlikely that De origine Gothorum, or similar, was the original title of the text.

Isidore wrote two versions of his Historia Gothorum. It is generally accepted that the longer redaction of the Historia Gothorum is an expanded version of the shorter.[32] Although there has been some speculation that the first redaction of the text may have been the work of another historian writing in the 610s, this has not been widely accepted.[33] Elsewhere I have suggested that the first redaction of the Historia Gothorum aligns with Isidore's other writings and that, even if Isidore did not write the text, it certainly emerged from a cultural milieu very similar to that in which he operated.[34] In any case, the second redaction of the Historia Gothorum represents a significant development of the first. The shorter redaction ends with the death of Sisebut in 621 and the longer in the middle of Suinthila's reign in 625.[35] The publication of the different versions of the Historia Gothorum thus mirrors that of the Chronica Maiora, occurring under Sisebut and Suinthila, respectively, and celebrating their various achievements, especially victories against the Byzantines.[36]

Although the Historia Gothorum has traditionally been considered a work of narrative history, its genre "has never been satisfactorily defined".[37] There are organisational similarities to the chronicles: for example, the chronological framework derives from reigns of individual Visigothic kings, just as the versions of Isidore's Chronica were ordered by the reigns of Roman and earlier emperors. The Historia Gothorum offers a fairly sparse narrative of Visigothic history, and Isidore makes few comments on the events that he records. Again, this resembles the Chronica, where narrative description and explicit authorial intervention are largely absent. We should still see the Historia Gothorum, especially in its second redaction, which included significant additions of a panegyric and encomiastic nature, as a form of narrative history, but one that was influenced by chronographical conventions and Isidore's belief that good history should be presented briefly.

3.3 Biographies

At some point between 598 and 615 Isidore composed the De ortu et obitu patrum, a biographical catalogue of the lives of various biblical figures. He based the work on scriptural material combined with Patristic commentaries and a limited number of histories and chronicles, and situated his biblical fathers in universal historical time by noting the imperial reigns during which some of the apostles and evangelists lived.[38] The text was designed as a sort of general biographical introduction to the main figures of biblical history, as the preface reveals, in which Isidore states that "The birth, deeds and genealogies of certain holy and most noble men have been introduced", briefly alongside their "rank, death and burial" in a "small book." He goes on to state that anyone could have found this information by skimming through the "fullness of the Scriptures" but that it returns "more easily to memory" through a brief exposition.[39] The De ortu et obitu patrum was thus designed to provide an easy-to-use and accessible resource for those who wanted to engaging in scriptural study.

Isidore's De viris illustribus is a list of thirty-three famous Christians who mostly lived in the 5th, 6th, and 7th centuries. The work may have been intended to celebrate the lives of Leander of Seville and Gregory the Great, who were closely connected in the text and both of whom had probably died in the years immediately before the text was written.[40] Although scholars used to date its composition to 615–18, the De viris illustribus has been redated to sometime between 604 and 608.[41] Whatever date we accept, the text forms a neat pair with De ortu et obitu patrum, providing a list of recent Christian celebrities to complement the catalogue of ancient biblical figures.

Isidore was concerned with establishing the historical excellence of the Spanish church through reference to the illustrious ecclesiastics of its past. His De viris illustribus therefore continued the catalogues of famous Christians that had been initiated by Jerome (347/348–419/420) in the late 4th century and extended by Gennadius of Marseilles (d. 496) at the end of the 5th.[42] However, because there had not been very many Spanish churchmen in the works of his predecessors, Isidore created a list that included a host of orthodox and literary Spanish bishops. In addition, if, as seems likely, the three different De viris illustribus texts circulated together, then De ortu et obitu patrum can be read as preliminary to that collection. Isidore's De viris illustribus closed out the compilation, creating a full catalogue of illustrious Christians from biblical times up to the (increasingly Spanish) present.

4 The Etymologiae and Beyond

Isidore's magnum opus, the Etymologiae, was probably published in 627/628, although it was written over a period of perhaps a decade and preliminary versions may have been released earlier.[43] The text was a compendium of classical and Christian knowledge arranged according to the etymologies of words. It used to be seen as little more than an extended exercise in antiquarianism, but recent research has overturned this judgement. Isidore's efforts to epitomise and etymologise ancient knowledge are now seen as part of a determined attempt to connect with the past in order to put its legacy to work for positive ends in the present, namely to educate the clergy and evangelise the population of Spain.[44]

The Etymologiae are also important to our inquiries into Isidore's historical worldview because the text includes a vast amount of information about the past, including the Chronica Minora, and, as we saw above, a definition of "history." Indeed, historical reasoning was central to the Etymologiae as a whole, and etymological thinking can be considered as a form of historical discourse.[45] Isidore stated that etymology "is the origin of words, when the power of a word or a name is gathered together through interpretation. […] For when you have seen whence a word has originated, you understand its force more quickly. Indeed, one's insight into anything is clearer when its etymology is known".[46] The Etymologiae thus sought out the (historical) origins of words in order to find out their true underlying meanings.

A large number of Isidore's other writings, even those that are not "historical" in form, design, or stated intent, were composed via a process that involved excerpting and editing earlier authors. In producing texts such as the Sententiae, Isidore essentially created "collages" of the works of those who had gone before him, focussing on particular topics of spiritual, pastoral, and grammatical importance. Equally significant was the role that Isidore played in the collation and editing of the records of church councils, including contemporary councils within Spain, as well as those from further afield and from the more distant past.[47] Isidore aimed, as many previous commentators have acknowledged, to collate the knowledge of earlier Christian and non-Christian writers in order to make it useful for his contemporaries. Whether or not the form or content of the resulting works was "historical," the process of composition can be considered as such.

5 An Historiographical Project

Although Isidore was acutely aware of the historiographical traditions in which he wrote, in practice there was overlap between narrative histories and chronicles.[48] It was not uncommon for chronicles to provide very full narrative accounts of near contemporary events and to include a great deal of comment by the author. Often this was because chroniclers were implicated in the (recent) events that they were recounting. Conversely, some histories, including the Historia Gothorum, offered quite sparse accounts of history and incorporated minimal authorial comment, while histories and chronicles also often drew on each other as sources of information. Isidore's historical writings are no exception here; there was a significant degree of interpenetration between the various elements of his historiographical output, and this caused a blurring of the boundaries between what we have come to consider as separate genres: history, biography, and chronography (and etymology).

[48] Jacques Fontaine, Isidore de Séville: genèse et originalité de la culture hispanique au temps des Wisigoths (Turnhout: 2000), 217–33, offers a survey of Isidore's histories and chronicles.

As was noted above, Isidore identified several different forms of historical writing in the Etymologiae (diaries, annals, histories) and focussed on defining the boundaries of the genre. Although he did not distinguish between annals and chronicles at the point at which he defined history in the Etymologiae (1.41–44), later in the text he discussed the vocabulary for chronicles (5.28). Presumably, the reason that he did not mention chronicles earlier was because there was a very close interrelationship between annals and chronicles.

> "Chronicle" is the Greek term for what is called a "succession (series) of times" in Latin. Among the Greeks Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, compiled such a work, and the priest Jerome translated it into Latin.[49]

In Isidore's conception, therefore, chronicles were a form of history because a chronicle was a series of times (the period remained undefined), a term that is defined in the section on history in the Etymologiae.[50] As was noted above, he describe and organised the Historia Gothorum in terms that fitted his definition of chronicles, as recording a succession of reigns (in this case of Visigothic kings). This would make additional sense if the Historia Gothorum was originally entitled De origine Gothorum (or similar) because chronicles and etymologies (the search for the origins of words) were closely related ways of thinking about and presenting the past. Annals were a subcategory of chronicles (and histories) because they only dealt with the yearly division and succession of history, while chronicles could cover history divided into any series of units of time (including yearly, annalistic accounts).[51]

[51] For discussion of the distinction that Isidore draws between histories and annals see Matthew Kempshall, "Some Ciceronian Models for Einhard's Life of Charlemagne," Viator 26 (1995), 16–17.

There is less certainty about how Isidore understood the relationship between chronicles and narrative histories. Chronicles were a form of historical writing, while narrative histories could also fall into the category of chronicles if they dealt with a succession of kings, as in the case of the Historia Gothorum. The blurred boundary between chronicles and histories can be illustrated by the decision by the authors of the texts known collectively as the Chronicle of Alfonso III, written in northern Spain at some point in the late 9th century, to use the Historia Gothorum rather than the Chronica as the baseline for their text.[52] The chronological ordering of the Historia Gothorum meant that it was a suitable basis from which later chroniclers could continue, while its more explicit emphasis on Visigothic history meant that it was more useful than the Chronica for Asturian historians, who by the 9th century were seeking to present their kingdom as standing in legitimate succession to the Goths.[53]

For Isidore, therefore chronicles were defined by form: the chronological ordering of the past. Histories were defined by their contents—that is, that they recounted the events of the past and put them to use in the present. Isidore, therefore, recognised that there were broad categories of historical writing but that they accomplished different objectives and took different forms. Isidore's sources influenced his delineation of these categories, but his own histories do not adhere to the strict distinctions between ideal historiographical types. Of course, this may be because the histories were written before he had laid down the theories. However, a more productive reading is to focus on the key features of all historical writing: its chronological ordering and its moral imperative, rather than its conformity or otherwise to strictly defined genre boundaries. Chronology and morality were thus structuring principles that underlay the entirety of Isidore's historical discourse.

The breadth of Isidore's writing about history raises questions about the inter-relations between his different historical works. As was noted above, the De viris illustribus, a catalogue of biographies of famous men, built on the list of biblical figures presented in De ortu et obitu patrum and the earlier works of the Christian historians Jerome and Gennadius to place orthodox Spaniards at the centre of universal church history. More purely "historical" works, such as the Chronica Maiora and the Historia Gothorum occupied complementary positions on a continuum: they were intimately connected, since they sought to praise the Visigoths and to discredit their barbarian and Roman opponents, using varying tactics to accomplish this. The Historia Gothorum emphasised the military power of the Visigoths in the recent past, while the Chronica Maiora tried to discredit the Romans by presenting them as politically and religiously illegitimate over a longer period. The Chronica Maiora enabled Isidore to tie the Visigoths into the development of universal history, positioning the newly orthodox people at the culmination of universal history and in legitimate possession of Spain, while the Historia Gothorum praised the orthodoxy and legitimacy of the Visigoths and their kings and demonstrated that they held Spain by right of conquest.[54] It is therefore unsurprising that the Visigoths and Spain are largely absent from the Chronica Minora, since Isidore had already exalted them to varying degrees in the Chronica Maiora, the Historia Gothorum, and the De viris illustribus.

There is a striking degree of continuity on these topics across Isidore's historical writings and between his histories and other works. The histories often align with one another thematically, and the manuscript transmission of the histories suggests that later copyists recognised that they were connected to one another in their focus on Visigothic-Nicene royal power within Spain. The inclusion of an epitomised version of Isidore's Chronica into the Etymologiae is further evidence of the integration of the histories into Isidore's overall output. Scholars have also noted the close association between Isidore's theological and polemical writings on the Jews and his depiction of Jewish history in the histories.[55]

Although Isidore's views developed over time—for example on the negative impact of the Byzantines on Spain and the need for the Hispano-Roman population to work with, rather than against, the Visigothic monarchy—these often represent intensifications of earlier positions, not absolute changes of opinion. Isidore built on the close working relationship that his brother, Leander of Seville, had enjoyed with the Visigothic kings under whom he held office, especially Reccared I (r. 586–601), who had been responsible for the conversion of the Visigoths from Homoian to Nicene Christianity.[56] An absolute belief in the righteousness of the Nicene cause was the single most important position underpinning Isidore's historical writings. The conversion narratives of the Visigoths (broadly speaking, from paganism and heresy towards Christian orthodoxy) and of the Roman-Byzantine Empire (from paganism to orthodoxy and then heresy) are the most important unifying strands running through his various histories. The conversion of the Visigoths to Nicene Christianity under Reccared in 587–89 stands as the pivotal moment in Isidore's recent history, affecting his depiction of the histories of the Roman (and Byzantine) Empire, Visigothic kingdom, and other "barbarian" groups within and beyond Spain.[57]

Isidore thus depicted the Visigoths positively, even when they were heretics, while he portrayed the Romans negatively, even when they adopted an orthodox position. Contemporary confessional considerations thus configured Isidore's depiction of the more distant past.[58] His positive views of the Visigoths meant that other barbarian groups, especially those who had defeated the Visigoths in the past, such as the Franks, and those who had occupied Spain before the Visigoths in the 5th century, such as the Vandals and the Sueves, were depicted negatively. Heretics and Jews were presented in a negative fashion due to the threat that they posed to the Nicene Christian consensus that Isidore sought to promote within Spain.[59] Isidore promoted consensus government in his writings on how the church should be run, and similar considerations underpinned his thinking on how the Visigothic kings should run the country in collaboration with their nobles and bishops. These ideas were given historiographical shape in the various histories.[60]

Isidore's focus on consensus reveals him as a pragmatist. The bishops were unlikely to get very much done on the ground without the approval of the king, his administration, and the provincial elites, both Visigothic and Hispano-Roman.[61] He seems to have realised that the Byzantines were no longer a realistic option—their oppressive taxes and religious deviance apparently threatened the Nicene consensus that he sought to promote between king, elite, and bishops within Spain.[62]

The manuscript traditions of the histories also point towards interrelationships between the texts. There are perhaps as few as three manuscripts containing any of Isidore's writings that were produced in the 7th-century Visigothic kingdom.[63] The number of manuscripts from Spain or elsewhere that predate the end of the Visigothic kingdom in the early 8th century and contain the historical works is also low. The manuscript evidence therefore does not offer much hope for developing our understanding of the context in which Isidore produced the works. Nevertheless, there are manuscripts from the late 8th, 9th, and early 10th centuries that contain the histories, both individually and in combination. These artefacts cannot inform us about Isidore's design for his histories, but they do tell us something about how the works were received, read, and repurposed in the centuries immediately after his death.

Among the earliest manuscripts (from the 10th century and before), Isidore's histories were either collated with other Isidorian works or copied into manuscripts with other late antique or early medieval histories. Such compendia seem to have been particularly popular in the Carolingian Empire.[64] The circulation of Isidore's works with those of other historians is particularly important because it suggests that his histories were understood as being integrated into the mainstream of Christian chronography and historiography, sitting comfortably alongside the foundational texts of late antique and early medieval historical writing in Latin: the Chronicle of Eusebius-Jerome, Rufinus's translation and continuation of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, and Orosius's Seven Books of History against the Pagans.[65] They were also included alongside texts on Frankish history and those reflecting the increasing Carolingian interest in Alexander the Great.[66] Similarly, Isidore's De viris illustribus circulated alongside the earlier works of Jerome and Gennadius. Together with the mid-7th-century De viris illustribus of Ildefonsus of Toledo they became essential biographical and bibliographical resources for historians and librarians in Frankia and northern Spain in the 9th and 10th centuries.[67]

[66] McKitterick, History and Memory, 28.

Early manuscripts in which Isidore's historical writings circulate together are particularly important. In Wolfenbuttel, Herzog August Bibliothek, Helmstedt, 532, produced in 820 in Salzburg or Wissemburg, the De ortu et obitu patrum, the Chronica, and extracts from books 6 and 7 of the Etymologiae accompany other Isidorian and pseudo-Isidorian writings, as well as works by other authors.[68] El Escurial, R.11.18 also transmits a range of Isidorian historical and non-historical writings, along with a number of other historical texts, including: the second redaction of Isidore's Historia Gothorum, his Etymologiae and De natura rerum, the Breviary of Rufius Festus, and the Chronicon of Eusebius-Jerome.[69]

Of even greater significance are the manuscripts now situated in Bern (Burgerbibliothek, 83), St Gallen (Stiftsbibliothek, 133), and St Petersburg/Paris (Publichnaja Biblioteka im. M.E. Saltykove Shchedrina, lat. Q.I.v.20/BNF, lat. 14144).[70] In each of these manuscripts, the dates of which range from the late 8th century to the first half of the 10th century and all of which derive from Frankia, Isidore's Chronica is copied alongside a range of other late antique and Frankish historical writings. Most importantly, included in these historical writings are Isidore's De Laude Spaniae (in two manuscripts) and Laus Gothorum (in all three), respectively the preface and epilogue to the second redaction of the Historia Gothorum, which celebrate the greatness of Spain and the power of the Visigoths. The praise writings are inserted directly after the Chronica in the manuscripts. An early-9th-century manuscript, León Cathedral 22, seems to have undergone a similar process of production. It contains the De Laude Spaniae alongside the De viris illustribus of Jerome, Gennadius, Isidore, and Ildefonsus.[71] These cases suggest that, at various times, Isidore's Chronica and De viris illustribus were read and copied alongside the second redaction of the Historia Gothorum. Later copyists deliberately extracted the praise writings from the Historia Gothorum and inserted them directly after the Chronica or the De viris illustribus, excluding the main parts of the Historia. If the intention was to create an Isidorian historical compendium, then the Chronica, De viris illustribus, and the praise writings would have emphasised Hispano-Visigothic particularism. This agenda is largely implicit in the Chronica and De viris illustribus, but it would have been intensified when such texts were read against the triumphal rhetoric of the praise texts. Whatever the reasons for the decision to include the Chronica, De viris illustribus, the De Laude Spaniae, and the Laus Gothorum in the same manuscripts, their relationship is strong evidence that some later readers and compilers made close connections between the different parts of Isidore's historical output.

Yet more evidence for the interconnections between Isidore's historical writings is provided by Madrid BAH 78, which dates to the 10th or 11th century.[72] The manuscript transmits a range of historical writings from the post-Visigothic period in northern Spain and a number of Isidorian and pseudo-Isidorian texts. The Isidorian writings include, in order: the histories of the Vandals and the Sueves; the Chronica; the Historia Gothorum; the De laude Spaniae (which normally acts as the preface to the second redaction of the Historia Gothorum). Madrid BAH 78 therefore points towards active engagement with the Isidorian historiographical patrimony in northern Spain in the 10th and 11th centuries. As part of this process, Isidore's histories were broken up and repositioned in combination with one another and with later Spanish histories.

The earliest manuscripts therefore provide some support for the thesis that Isidore's histories were designed to be read together. Of course, the destruction of the Visigothic kingdom by the Arab-Berber armies in the early 8th century means that it is impossible for us to know much about how Isidore's histories were received by the generations that followed him within Spain.[73] An indirect result of the invasion was, however, the movement of Spanish manuscripts and manpower elsewhere in Western Europe. This facilitated the dispersal of Isidorian historiography. Examination of the manuscripts of Isidore's histories reveals that, whether or not he intended them to be read as a group, later copyists made associations between the different historical writings.

These associations emerged within three main contexts: first, the growth of historiographical collection and production within Frankia in the 8th, 9th, and 10th centuries; second, the educational reform programmes of Ireland, Frankia, and Anglo-Saxon England, in which Isidore's writings played a pivotal role; and third, in northern Spain in the 9th and 10th centuries.[74] Sometimes Isidore's histories were connected with each other, with their late antique historiographical sources, and with other Isidorian writings. On the majority of occasions, however, a far more complex process went on: the histories were copied together, but in a creative manner. They were broken down into their constituent parts and put back together to create new historical texts. Importantly, these "new" histories often emphasised the same features of history as seem to have underlain Isidore's work, celebrating Spanish and Visigothic particularism (even triumphalism) and promoting grammatical, spiritual, and historical education within the church. On this interpretation, those who engaged with Isidore's histories in the centuries after his death actually intensified the driving forces behind the Isidorian historiographical programme rather than dissipating them.

6 The Purpose of History-Writing

Early medieval history-writing was a process by which people sought to articulate ideas about how and why present times had taken on their distinctive shape: "a clearly structured concept of time […] can only be established within an agreement to put events in a temporal and causal relationship. History is exegetical commentary."[75] The definition of history in the Etymologiae underlines this point, making clear that the genre only incorporated information that was deemed worth recording and served a moral purpose. Writing historically involved making a claim about the truth or accuracy of what was being written.

> A history is a narration of deeds accomplished; through it what occurred in the past is distinguished. History is so called from the Greek term ἱστορεῖν ("inquire, observe"), that is, from "seeing" or from "knowing." Indeed, among the ancients no one would write a history unless he had been present and had seen what was to be written down, for we grasp with our eyes things that occur better than what we gather with our hearing, since what is seen is revealed without falsehood. This discipline has to do with Grammar, because whatever is worthy of remembrance is committed to writing. And for this reason, histories are called "monuments," because they grant a remembrance of deeds that have been done.[76]

Two chapters later, Isidore explains that history is a useful form of writing because it can instruct people in the present through the use of past examples:

> Histories of peoples are no impediment to those who wish to read useful works, for many wise people have imparted the past deeds of humankind in histories for the instruction of the living. Through history they handle a final reckoning back through seasons and years, and they investigate many indispensable matters through the succession of consuls and kings.[77]

Similar ideas are present elsewhere in Isidore's writings. In the Sententiae, for example, Isidore discusses historical and other ways of understanding divine law: "Therefore, in this way history ought to preserve faith, so that we must both interpret it morally and understand it spiritually."[78] Writing about the past was a powerful carrier for moral and spiritual truth.

The importance of history-writing for Isidore is further signalled by the numerous references that he makes to "history," "histories", and individual historians as sources of information, across his different works. For example, in the Versus, he contrasts history with fables or poetry.[79] Reference to "history" was a way of demonstrating that his sources were reliable and thus that what he was saying was trustworthy. In addition to emphasising the traditions and forms of historical writing, there is, in Isidore's definition of history, a focus on the moral value of history. According to Isidore, history is used by wise people for the instruction of the living. Isidore held this opinion in common with the majority of ancient and late antique historians, who used historical writing to make didactic points, to moralise, and to provide examples from the past for the instruction of the present.[80] The same was true for other Christian authors who wrote about history in more abstract terms. Cassiodorus, whose Institutiones, written in 6th-century Italy, was an important source for the Etymologiae, also stressed the moral imperative underpinning history-writing.[81]

It was not simply the content of history that could drive home moral points for the instruction of contemporaries: the form in which history was presented could also further this objective. In his Sententiae, Isidore notes that the actions of kings play an exemplary role for their subjects: "Kings either improve or overturn the life of their subjects easily by their examples, and for that reason it is necessary that the leader is not found wanting, lest with the unpunished licence of his sin he establishes a pattern of sinning."[82] As was noted above, Isidore's Historia Gothorum and Chronica are both structured according to the reigns of kings and emperors, respectively. At the start of the Historia Gothorum, for example, Isidore notes that the work compiles the deeds of individual kings in succession: "In the past, many centuries ago, they [the Goths] employed military leaders and later kings, whose reigns it is fitting to review quickly and in succession, weaving together the information extracted from the histories about their identities and deeds."[83] Isidore also described his Chronica Maiora as recording history according to a succession of reigns.[84] We should therefore see a close interpenetration between the moral objectives of history-writing and their practical working out in the exemplary actions of rulers.

It is significant that Isidore refers to his history as reviewing the reigns of kings quickly because the style of historical writing was understood to help the author to put across moral messages. Ancient writers on history discussed the need to strike a balance between an overly detailed and wordy narrative and excessive brevity.[85] For Isidore, the need to keep things brief was paramount:

> Often extended narrative causes the memory of reading to be forgotten for the reason of length. Because if it is concise then it is read without effort, and when the book has been removed the meaning is drawn back into the soul, and those things which have been read, being recalled, will be extracted with very little memory.[86]

Brevity was thus, in Isidore's opinion, a way of articulating moral truths in the most efficient manner possible.[87] Abbreviation was also common in Isidore's biblical commentaries, and, as in the histories, such practices were underpinned by didactic and moralising principles.[88] Brief writing was therefore the best way of ensuring that his message remained in the mind of the audience. An excessively detailed historical narrative would achieve the opposite aim and blind the audience to the truth.[89]

7 Conclusion

In addition to the usually negative appraisals of Isidore's attempts to write history, scholars often used to comment on the dearth of Iberian historiogaphy in the period after Isidore in general. In 1970, Hillgarth went a long way toward dispelling this misapprehension by demonstrating that there was actually a great deal of historical writing available in Visigothic Spain, both in the form of original compositions and via the circulation of earlier texts.[90] New histories on the classical model may not have been composed (just as they were not composed elsewhere in the post-Roman West), but that does not mean that scholars in 7th-century Spain were not reading histories and using them in their writings. An overly deterministic focus on genre and on models of historical writing that derive from classical and ancient historiography has sometimes blinded scholars to the true significance of historical writing—understood as any kind of writing that is past-focussed—to unravelling contemporary mentalities.

The emphasis that is laid on the failure of the Visigoths to write "history" is to misunderstand the true importance of history to the Isidorian and post-Isidorian project in Spain and, in my view, the role of the past in the early medieval period in general. We know that the works of Isidore were circulating later in the 7th century in Spain, as were many of the works from which Isidore had drawn inspiration. Education in history and through historical exemplars played an important role in the pedagogic projects of Visigothic churchmen too. Scholars after Isidore, such as Taio of Zaragoza, continued the work of excerpting, summarising, and glossing Patristic authors in order to make them useful for the clergy and monks of the Visigothic kingdom. People who came after Isidore in 7th-century Spain wrote histories of different sorts, from Braulio of Zaragoza's hagiography of St Aemilian to Julian of Toledo's history of King Wamba.[91] Several other hagiographies were written. Although these texts may include information of varying degrees of historicity, they also provide powerful further evidence of the important of past-oriented writing to contemporaries.[92] The purposes of these hagiographical texts were, like the histories of Isidore, to promote particular visions of the past that emphasised the historical importance of particular individuals or communities.[93]

There was also a continued interest in chronograpy in the later 7th century. Lists of Visigothic kings (the so-called laterculus Visigothorum) were written.[94] Their organisation by reign is exactly the same as that of Isidore's Chronica (imperial reigns structure the text) and the Historia Gothorum (organised by reigns of Visigothic kings) and, like their predecessors, the king lists include details of length of reigns and, in a limited number of cases, some information about historical events. The fact that Isidore's Chronica was used as the starting point for later histories and chronicles in northern Spain implies that they, too, were being copied earlier, while, as we have seen, there are Spanish transmission histories for the Historia Gothorum and the De viris illustribus.

It is also worth considering eschatological writings from Visigothic Spain if we are to understand fully the role of history in the religious imagination of Visigothic Spain. I have argued elsewhere that thinking about the end of time in Visigothic Spain involved considering what had gone before it, inevitably drawing the author and his audience into history.[95] All of the different versions of Isidore's Chronica end with warnings that the date of the end of the world is known only to God, in order to discourage eschatological speculation. Other eschatological texts from the 7th century, including Julian of Toledo's De comprobatione sextae aetatis, incorporate brief overviews of history. Importantly, the ages of the world are organised in Julian's De comprobatione in the same way as they had been in the second redaction of Isidore's Chronica Maiora.[96] These works—and many others beside them—are not framed as classical histories, but they do include accounts of Christian world history in its entirety, and, in passing, they incorporate substantial amounts of historical information. This may not be "historical" information as modern historians or classicists conceive of it, but accounts of biblical figures and events would clearly have been considered historical by Isidore and his contemporaries. Isidore's histories and chronicles were thus penned within and influenced by an intellectual world in which history played a pivotal role. Isidore's Spain was not some kind of historiographical wasteland, but a place in which history was fundamental to understanding past and present, as well as to influencing the future.

CHAPTER 7

Isidore of Seville and Science

Faith Wallis

1 Introduction

As Ascension Day 735 drew near, Bede the Venerable lay dying in his Northumbrian monastic cell. According to his disciple Cuthbert, he was anxious to complete two projects: turning the Gospel of John into the vernacular "to the great profit of the church," and translating or making selections (exceptiones) from Isidore of Seville's Liber rotarum, i.e. De natura rerum (On the Nature of Things), "for he said, 'I cannot have my children learning what is not true (mendacium), and losing their labour on this after I am gone.'"[1] This statement has often been taken as evidence that Bede held Isidore in low esteem, and that the mendacia he was concerned with were Isidore's. After all, in Chapter 35 of his mature synthesis of computus, The Reckoning of Time (De temporum ratione), Bede had compared different dates for the beginning of the seasons and declared his preference for the authority of "the Greeks and Romans" rather than "the Spaniards" and their bishop Isidore.[2] Many have concluded that this is a criticism of Isidore's reliability.[3]

But is this the case? The beginnings of the seasons, unlike the equinoxes, were not determined by astronomy, but by custom. Where usages differed, Bede gave precedence to the ancients, but this is not the same thing as saying the moderns are wrong. Indeed, the very fact that Bede thought it worthwhile to spend his last days in the company of Isidore's On the Nature of Things undermines the argument that he disdained him. Cuthbert does not say that Bede was correcting Isidore, but rather that he was excerpting, or perhaps translating his work. The mendacia may be the ignorance Isidore's words would dispel, or even a faulty translation already in circulation.[4] One suspects that the conventional view owes much to scholarly prejudice: Bede is admired as a "scientist"; Isidore's learning is derided as superficial and unoriginal.[5]

More pertinently, Bede's first dated work (702), also called On the Nature of Things, is essentially derived from Isidore's book; perhaps Cuthbert, and even Bede himself, appreciated the symbolism of closing his earthly career with the very enterprise which began it. Bede recast Isidore by removing the chapters on the units of time (these he relocated to his companion treatise On Times [De temporibus]) and adding information from Pliny and Irish cosmographies,[6] but much of the balance is direct quotation from his model. When Bede revised these two books as The Reckoning of Time in 725, he retained what he had borrowed from Isidore and added further material from the Etymologies. Throughout his career, Bede used Isidore as a major resource for information about the material cosmos and issues concerning time, as did the Irish computists, cosmographers, and exegetes, and the Carolingians who followed in his wake.[7] A lineage of books entitled On the Nature of Things, stretching from Hrabanus Maurus (d. 856) to Alexander Neckam (1157–1217), followed Bede by borrowing Isidore's title, as well as their scientific content from his Etymologies, as did encyclopedias with more creative titles, like Vincent of Beauvais's Speculum naturale.[8] Isidore's authority as a touchstone of erudition guaranteed the integration into medieval clerical culture of a wide range of scientific topics and disciplines that far exceeded the practical requirements of exegesis or computus.

Isidore's profound and durable influence is also related to his attitude towards ancient science. Compared with the great Fathers of the 4th and 5th centuries or his contemporary Gregory the Great, Isidore took a broadminded and almost relaxed approach to secular learning. He perhaps had less to fear from any continued intellectual attraction of paganism or classical culture than did earlier generations of Christian thinkers, but he also had a positive vision of the value of that culture for ecclesiastical and national revival in Spain.[9] When it came to matters of science, he drew on both classical and Patristic writings, seemingly without discrimination: indeed, he often "reverse engineered" his information from allusions to ancient science and philosophy found on the pages of Lactantius, Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome, and the pseudo-Clementine Recognitions.[10] Unlike Cassiodorus, who was certainly one of his major inspirations, Isidore did not segregate "divine" and "human" learning.[11] He wove exegesis and allegory into the cosmology of On the Nature of Things, but not consistently; and the books of the Etymologies on Scripture, God and the saints, and the Church are embedded between the liberal and learned disciplines (books 1–5), and the survey of the natural world and the mechanical arts (books 11–20). In both works, Isidore exploited classical handbooks, like Hyginus' On Astronomy, commentaries on the Timaeus of Plato, and compendia like Solinus' Collectanea and Pliny's Natural History (Historia naturalis), but a significant percentage of his science comes from the Latin poets—notably Lucan, Virgil, and Lucretius—and their scholiasts, particularly Servius.

On the Nature of Things is the first comprehensive work on cosmology by a Latin Christian writer that is not a commentary on the account of creation in Genesis.[12] Its format—a survey of the world-system from the heavens down to the earth—yokes astronomy to the topics encompassed by Aristotelian meteora: atmospheric phenomena, weather, tides and the water cycle, and seismic and volcanic activity. While astronomy focused on the regularities of heavenly motion, meteorology sought to explain how sublunar events, although inherently unpredictable, are nonetheless natural consequences of the interactions of earth, air, water, and fire.[13] Clouds (Isidore tells us) are formed from water, but when wind agitates them, they are set on fire, producing lightning. Earthquakes can be caused by gusting winds in subterranean caverns, the collapse of underground caves, and buried rivers.[14]

On the Nature of Things also innovates by beginning with a survey of the units of time, from the day up to the year with its division into seasons and into astronomical quarters marked by the solstices and equinoxes (Chs 1–8). This is therefore a summary of classical calendar time; although it was excerpted into works on computus, notably by Bede, it does not discuss the management of the Christian calendar or the calculation of Easter. When Isidore deals with units of time in the Etymologies, he separates this subject from astronomy (book 3) and cosmology (book 13), locating it instead in book 5, as part of his treatment of law, as if time-keeping served essentially as a function of social order. Computus, on the other hand, is located in book 6, dedicated to Scripture and ecclesiastical observances and offices. There the Paschal tables are treated as a special type of Christian graphic representation of information, directly after canon tables. While computus was destined to evolve into a platform for early medieval scientific learning, Isidore does not seem to have regarded it in this light.[15]

Whether Isidore intended to give his book the same title as Lucretius' poem is a matter of debate. This was the title given by Braulio of Zaragoza in his Renotatio librorum domini Isidori, ed. J.C. Martín, CCSL 113B (Turnhout: 2006), 201–02. MSS from the 7th and 8th centuries either have no title, or the rubric De mundo or Liber rotarum. De natura rerum is standard from the 9th century onwards, and is particularly associated with the long recension of the text that probably represents Isidore's final edition: see Calvin B. Kendall and Faith Wallis, Isidore of Seville: On the Nature of Things (Liverpool: 2016), 38–40.

[15] Isidore's computus and its reception is discussed in a separate chapter of the present volume, by Immo Wartjes.

The Etymologies[16] has long been hailed as the first Christian "encyclopedia,"[17] and if this anachronistic term can be problematic, it nonetheless reflects the way medieval readers treated this book as a rich, flexible, and useful repository of authoritative knowledge. The etymological method ultimately proved less interesting than "the ecumenical breadth of the work, and … its staggering accretion of detail."[18] Much of that breadth and detail concern subjects which, for a modern reader, constitute science: mathematics, including astronomy (book 3); the On the Nature of Things' constellation of cosmology, meteorology, and geography (books 13–14); human biology and psychology (book 11); animals (book 12); and minerals (book 16). Plants are subsumed within the techniques of agriculture (book 17), but the supremely scientific ars is medicine, the "Second Philosophy" that, like the first philosophy, deals with the entire human person and draws on all the liberal disciplines (book 5, esp. 5.13).

2 Isidore's "Science," Isidore's "Nature"

Before surveying the content of these works,[19] however, it is necessary to adjust our modern expectations of science to the categories that Isidore recognized, and to clarify what he understood by science's epistemic object, "nature." "Science" in the modern sense of the word is a 19th-century coinage, and though Isidore certainly could conceive of factual knowledge about, and models of, the physical world and its contents, including living beings, there was no single term or discipline which for him encompassed such knowledge.[20] For Isidore, scientia denoted securely established rational knowledge on any subject (cum res aliqua certa ratione percipitur), as distinct from uncertain "opinion" (opiniatio). But knowledge about the physical world is not necessarily scientia. In fact, Isidore's illustrative example of opiniatio is cosmology:

[17] This is the argument of Ribémont, Les origines, and it stands in a long tradition, beginning with Ernest Brehaut, An Encyclopedist of the Dark Ages: Isidore of Seville (New York: 1912) and consolidated by Jacques Fontaine, "Isidore de Séville et la mutation de l'encyclopédisme antique," Cahiers de civilisation mondiale 9 (1966), 520–38.

[19] This chapter will concentrate on these two works, but Isidore composed other books in which he included some scientific material, notably book 1 of the Differences (De differentiis I); the Book of Numbers (Liber numerorum), a handbook of numerology for exegetes; and the Sentences (Sententiae). For a discussion of the way in which, for example, his

Isidore's notion of "natural philosophy" is indeterminate as well, since he entertains different schemes for locating natural philosophy within the larger project of philosophy. The tripartite Platonic division of philosophy into "natural (naturalis) which in Greek is 'physics' (physica)", moral, and rational or logical defines natural philosophy as that which "discusses the investigation of nature" using the mode of "inquiring" The founder of physica, Thales of Miletus, "examined the first principles of the sky and the power of natural things (rerum naturalium) with contemplative reason." But Isidore then adds that Plato divided physica into the four mathematical disciples of arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy.[22] The disciplinae, though, are defined as "concerned with things that have only one possible outcome", as distinct from ideas about the human body as microcosm appears in these three works, see Fontaine, Isidore culture pt. 5, Ch. 3, esp. 649–50, 654–57, 663–65, 670.

[20] On the challenge of discussing "science" in early medieval culture, see Faith Wallis, "Si Naturam Quaeras: Reframing Bede's 'Science'," in Tradition and Innovation in the Writings of the Venerable Bede, ed. Scott DeGregorio (Morgantown: 2006), 61–94; Faith Wallis, "Bede's 'Science'," in The Cambridge Companion to Bede, ed. Scott DeGregorio (Cambridge: 2010), 113–26.

[21] Isidore, Etymologiae 2.23.2, trans. Barney et al., 79. Isidore is drawing on Lactantius, Institutiones 3.3.4.

the artes that consist of "matters that can turn out in different ways."[23] This aligns them with scientia as knowledge which is necessary and determinate, about objective realities; it would apply to both abstract numbers and concrete material entities.

Isidore offers a second division of philosophy, this time from Cassiodorus. Philosophy is divided into speculative and practical, and speculative philosophy comprises natural philosophy, "doctrinal" philosophy, and "divine" philosophy. The quadrivium is now classified as "doctrinal," but whether natural philosophy deals with res naturales is unclear, for Isidore defines speculative philosophy as a whole as exclusively concerning invisible, incorporeal, divine, and heavenly things.[24] At the same time, he declares that "natural philosophy" deals with "the nature (natura) of each individual thing", that is "those properties according to which the Creator defined it, unless perhaps by the will of God some miracle is shown to occur."[25]

Isidore clearly was not concerned with imposing a unitary structure on scientia, or defining res naturales in only one way. His views become more legible if we read them through the lens of the genres or expository registers in which he wrote about science. These are three: the mathematical disciplines of the quadrivium (Etymologies 3); the macrocosmic world-system (cosmology, meteorology, geography: On the Nature of Things and Etymologies 13–14); and the inventory of nature (humans, animals, plants, minerals: Etymologies 11–12, 16–17). What "science" and "nature" are depends on the register.

In his first dedicatory letter to King Sisebut, Isidore referred to the Etymologies as "the work concerning the origin of certain things (opus de origine quarundam rerum)".[26] The phrase finds an interesting counterpart in the preface—also addressed to Sisebut—of On the Nature of Things, where Isidore claims to be responding to the king's request for instruction "concerning the nature and causes of things (ex rerum natura uel causis)."[27] Nature, origin, and cause are closely aligned concepts in Isidore's thinking. Both causa and origo are synonyms for "etymology,"[28] and Isidore relished the ambiguity: in the opening section of Etymologies book 12, he observes that Adam gave the animals their original names "according to their natural situation (iuxta condicionem naturae cui serviret)," thereby extending and completing God's work of creation.[29] In "inventory register" Isidore works from the premise that origo in the sense of creation is the causa or the reason why things happen as they do. The only passage in Etymologies where natura is explicitly defined is the beginning of book 11, on human beings, and there it is glossed as that which has the capacity of "engendering and creating." Some people, Isidore says, equate nature with God, because he creates everything.[30] Later in the same book, Isidore dismisses the idea that abnormal bodies are "unnatural," because giants, pygmies, and even monsters are all "created by divine will, since the nature of everything is the will of the Creator". Thus, prodigies are "not created contrary to nature, but contrary to what is known [about] nature."[31] These are also, of course, products of generation, even if they are anomalous.

In On the Nature of Things, however, where Isidore again reflects on anomalies, the relationship of "nature" and "cause" is construed in a different way. The storms and earthquakes of On the Nature of Things are "natural" because they are the results of physical processes which can be understood and explained. These processes are their "cause"; God of course created them, but unlike the monsters of Etymologies, the unpredictable lightning strikes or volcanic eruptions of On the Nature of Things are not construed as direct acts of divine will. This is true even in cases of pestilence (Ch. 39); Isidore concedes that human sin might contribute a moral cause, but this just sets in train the natural cause, which is corruption of the air by heat or excess moisture.[32] In Chapter 40, various theories of tides are aired, but Isidore declares the question unresolvable in our present state of knowledge: which theory is correct "God alone knows, Isidore's views on the "naturally unnatural" are judged to be more negative by Mary Beagon, "Variations on a Theme. Isidore and Pliny on Human and Human-Instigated Anomaly," in Isidore of Seville and his Reception in the Early Middle Ages: Transmitting and Transforming Knowledge, eds. Andrew Fear and Jamie Wood (Amsterdam, 2016), 57–72. Her analysis is pertinent to anomalous humans and animals (see note 99 below), but less so to inanimate phenomena, such as earthquakes.

[32] Isidore, De natura rerum, ed. Fontaine, 303.4–8: "Quae sit uero causa huius pestilentiae quidam dixerunt: quando pro peccatis hominum plaga et correptio terris inicitur, tunc aliqua ex causa, id est aut siccitas aut caloris ui aut pluuiatum intemperantia, aera corrumpuntur."

whose work the world is, and the entire plan of the world is known only to him."[33] But the implication is that there is, in fact, a correct theory, even if it is not known.

In sum, when Isidore is working within the "world-system" tradition of On the Nature of Things, he implicitly thinks of "nature" as a process that issues in a result. In the "inventory of nature" sections of the Etymologies, "natures" are the properties of species, implanted at creation. Indeed, Isidore distinguishes etymologies derived from (purposeful) causa (kings or reges take their name from recte agendo, "acting justly") and etymologies derived from (generative) origo (e.g. "human" from humus, or earth).[34] These complementary dimensions of nature constitute his field of scientific knowledge and reflection.

3 On the Nature of Things: The System of the World Revisioned

Though Isidore wrote in the "world-system" register in both On the Nature of Things (composed 612–13) and Etymologies (begun 615), the earlier book is not merely a fragment of, or a rehearsal for, the later one.[35] While it deploys etymologies, On the Nature of Things is not structured by them, but instead around expositions, explanations (sometimes diverse), and occasionally arguments. One has only to compare the extended discussion of the mechanism of lunar and solar eclipses in On the Nature of Things chapters 20–21 with the exceedingly compressed account in Etymologies 3.57–58. Moreover, unlike Etymologies, On the Nature of Things includes illustrative schemata.[36] Finally, it is an oeuvre de circonstance, composed apparently in some haste at the request of

Isidore's sovereign, King Sisebut; the Etymologies was initiated by Isidore himself and was the product of decades of slow accumulation.[37]

Isidore's preface frames On the Nature of Things as a response to a royal command for information about "certain matters concerning the nature and causes of things." The hypothesis that this commission was related to an unusual series of lunar and solar eclipses in 611–12 is intriguing, but the inference that Isidore composed the work to allay "popular" panic at these phenomena fails to find support in the text itself.[38] To the contrary: Isidore refutes the charge that it is knowledge of "the nature of these things" itself that is superstitious (superstitiosa). This is not so, he says; provided that this knowledge accords with teaching (doctrina) that is sound (sana) and sensible (sobria), it is not superstitious. In classical Latin, superstitio denotes irrational credulity, or excessive dread of the gods or of omens. However, the term was redefined by Christian writers of the Patristic age to denote pagan beliefs in the very existence of the gods and daimones.[39] Hence when Isidore says that his science is not superstitiosa he may be defending his discussion of the names of the constellations (Ch. 26.1), or the days of the week (Ch. 3.4) from any charge of approving pagan mythology. Indeed, Isidore is less concerned with popular hysteria than with astrology. He distinguishes astronomy from astrology in the Etymologies: astronomia is the science of "the turning of the heavens, the rising, setting and motion of heavenly bodies, as well as the reason behind their names," and is without qualification legitimate; astrologia is a matter of fact (naturalis) when it measures the course of the sun and moon and planets, but superstitiosa when practiced by astrologers (mathematici) who divine which zodiac sign rules which part of the human body or mind, or presume to cast horoscopes.[40] Lurking in the back of Isidore's concerns with astrology may also be the heresy of Priscillian, bishop of Avila (d. 385), who embraced astral determinism and a belief that the heavenly bodies were agents in the cosmic war of good against evil.[41]

In defending himself against charges of "superstition" (i.e. paganism), Isidore may also be answering a trend in 6th-century Christian thought that amplified the opposition between classical Greco-Roman cosmology and the biblical picture of the world, associated particularly with the work of Cosmas Indicopleustes. But what ultimately justifies the study of the subjects covered in On the Nature of Things is its origin in a royal command. As a king, Sisebut can lay claim to the model of Solomonic wisdom represented in Isidore's quotation from Wisdom 7:17–19. This model encompasses the cosmos: "the disposition of the heavens, and the virtues of the elements, … the alterations of their courses, and the changes of seasons, the revolutions of the years, and disposition of the stars."[42] Oddly, given that On the Nature of Things includes a section on the divisions of time, Isidore omits from the quotation "the beginning and ending and midst of the times," probably because his treatise does not deal with history.[43] He also does not extend the catalogue of Solomonic wisdom to verse 20: "the natures of living creatures and rage of wild beasts, the force of winds and reasonings of men, the diversities of plants and the virtues of roots." These topics lie outside the "world-system" and belong with the "inventory of nature" that will feature in the Etymologies.

In the first chapter of On the Nature of Things, Isidore establishes a pattern which he will follow throughout the hemerological section of his book (Chs 1–8) by underscoring the relationship between time-reckoning and cosmology. A day is both a uniform unit of time-measurement and an event in the natural world—"the presence of the sun between its rising and setting"—for in the Genesis narrative, three days (in the sense of units of time) unfold before the sun makes the first natural day on the fourth day of creation.[44] Night (Ch. 2) is only a cosmological phenomenon – the absence of sunlight between sunset and sunrise—for as time, it is included within the day. The months are also treated both as divisions of time and in terms of the increase and decrease of daylight across the year (Ch. 5).

[43] See the chapter by Jamie Wood in this volume for Isidore as an historian.

Isidore defines the year (Ch. 6) etymologically as a complete circuit (annus = anus, or ring), symbolizing the totality of human life, or even eternity itself. He will not extend himself to longer epochs or ages (as he will in Etymologies book 5); instead, and in keeping with his book's focus on the system of the world, he reverses direction to analyse the year in terms of its natural seasons (Ch. 7) and its astronomical divisions by the solstices and equinoxes (Ch. 8).

In Chapter 9 (De mundo), Isidore switches his perspective to the material universe. Mundus for Isidore can mean either "cosmos" or "earth." This ambiguity extends to the two ways of dividing the mundus: the five circles of Chapter 10 (at once celestial circles and terrestrial climates), and the "parts of the world (de partibus mundi)" of Chapter 11, which are the four elements that govern physics below the orbit of the Moon. From Chapter 12 ("Heaven and its name") onwards, Isidore's text tracks the vertical order of the cosmos from the heavens down to the bowels of the earth. First he describes the "parts" of the celestial architecture, like the vault (cohus) or visible dome that seems to sit over the earth like an inverted silver bowl engraved with stars, and the axis that joins the poles. Then he sets this machinery in motion, the whole sphere turning on its axis once a day, from east to west. The sphericity of the universe justifies the biblical "waters above the firmament," which prevent the buildup of excess heat under the revolving orb (a Stoic concept).[45] The ultimate reason for the emphasis on the sphere, however, becomes evident in Chapter 12.5: the spherical shape of the universe is proof of the rational mind of its Creator, and even pagans like Plato acknowledge this. The universe's circular motion is rationality and intelligence itself, in contrast to the linear motions of forward, back, right and left, up and down.[46]

Chapters 13–21 on the planets form a tightly structured block, culminating in two chapters on eclipses, and reinforcing the themes of divine rationality and providential care. In Chapter 14 he deals directly with the one element of Christian cosmology that defied rationalization in terms of ancient physics, namely the waters above the firmament of Genesis 1:7. Isidore's argument is an interesting illustration of how he mined his science from his Patristic sources as well as from his classical reading, and shaped scientific problems in his own way.

For many Church Fathers, the "waters above the firmament" represented a point on which Scripture and pagan science could not be reconciled, and on which the superior authority of revelation must prevail. Origen attempted to resolve the problem of how water could rest on top of the fiery lower heavens, in defiance of the physics of the elements, by interpreting the waters as an allegory. This provoked a strenuous response from Basil of Caesarea in his Hexaemeron, the model and source of Ambrose's Hexaemeron: the waters had to be physical waters, and no scientific explanation of their existence was required. Augustine offered a more tentative defence of the reality of the supercelestial waters in The Literal Interpretation of Genesis. Though Isidore knew both these works, he chose here to follow Ambrose.[47] Ambrose dismisses the objections of philosophers who complain that the liquid waters would run down the sides of the sphere of the universe: "the one who could create everything from nothing could also stabilize the nature of the waters in heaven." But Isidore expanded Ambrose by adding after "the nature of the waters" the phrase "with the solidity of ice" (glaciali soliditate), which he lifted from Augustine's The Literal Interpretation of Genesis 2.5.[48] Augustine is presenting a hypothetical argument against the philosophers: if (as some pagans believe) Saturn, the planet closest to the outermost zone of heaven, is by nature cold, then there must be water in its vicinity, congealed into ice. The irony is that Augustine thinks this a rather foolish argument; Isidore, however, takes it at face value as celestial physics. This almost accidental hypothesis about the frozen nature of the supercelestial waters was destined to have a long career in Christian treatments of cosmology.[49]

Chapters 15–21 concern the motion and relative size of the Sun and Moon, and lead up to the explanation of solar and lunar eclipses. King Sisebut responded to On the Nature of Things by composing a poem on eclipses[50] that may have been intended to supplement or even correct Isidore's work. Among other things, it explains why eclipses do not occur every month, something which Isidore omits. Moreover, Sisebut explicitly chastises “superstition,” which Isidore does not. Instead, and rather surprisingly, Isidore offers both conventional and alternative explanations of eclipses, and some of the latter might even encourage irrational fear. In the case of the solar eclipse, “philosophers and wise men of this world” argue that the hole (foramen) in the atmosphere through which the Sun’s light passes can be blocked by “some exhalation” (aliquo spiritu).[51] The “exhalation” hints at atmospheric corruption, like pestilence (see Ch. 39), and even suggests some arbitrary or malevolent force. If one compares this chapter with Chapter 21 on the eclipse of the Moon the same pattern emerges: an explanation based on celestial mechanics is followed by one ascribed to the Stoics that suggests that a lunar eclipse is a shadow cast by mountains on the periphery of the earth.[52] Why is Isidore offering an alternative explanation at all?

The answer lies in the spiritual interpretations that close both chapters 20 and 21. In Chapter 21, Isidore compares Christ’s death and resurrection to the eclipse and re-emergence of the Sun. In so doing, he explains that the eclipse that took place at the Crucifixion was “unnatural,” though he does state why, namely that Christ was executed at Passover, when the Moon would have been full. Instead, Isidore interprets the darkness that covered the earth as the “sacrilegious conspiracy” of the Jews against Jesus[53]—a sort of spiritual corruption or pestilence which infected the elements. Likewise, in Chapter 21, lunar eclipses are likened to persecutions inflicted on the Church, whose earthly enemies might be imagined as hedging her around like mountains. This suggests that the less predictable and mechanistic explanations for eclipses were invoked by Isidore in order to do some particular exegetical work in relation to his allegories. For Sisebut, on the other hand, this was not the unequivocally rational explanation for which he was looking.

[52] Fontaine, Isidore culture, 500, argues that the mountain theory derives from a gloss on Lucan, whom Isidore somewhat inappropriately quotes, but he provides no evidence. Curiously, the mountain model bears some resemblance to Cosmas Indicopleustes’s explanation for night, namely that the Sun disappears behind a huge mountain in the centre of the (flat) earth: Jeffrey C. Anderson, “Description of the Miniatures and Commentary,” in The Christian Topography of Kosmas Indikopleustes (Firenze, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana, plut. 9.28): The Map of the Universe Redrawn in the Sixth Century, with a Contribution on the Slavic Recensions, ed. Chapters 22–27 constitute a block on the "stars" (stellae, sidera), by which Isidore denoted either the fixed stars or the planets or both. This ambiguous terminology generates some confusion, because Isidore shifts from discussing stars or constellations to discussing planets without warning, notably when describing their motion in Chapter 22.[54] Chapter 23 on the planets also contains puzzles: his names for the planets are eccentric (e.g. Mars is "Vesper," which normally denotes Venus) and quite different from those in Etymologies 3.71, and his figures for the length of each planet's circuit through the zodiac are peculiar: the Moon is said to take 8 years, Mercury 20 years, Venus 9 years, the Sun 19 years, and Mars 15 years. Only Jupiter and Saturn are correctly stated to have periods of 12 and 30 years, respectively. The subject of Chapter 24 is the source of starlight, and Isidore provides the answer in the first sentence: the stars shine with reflected light from the Sun. The remainder of the chapter exposes Isidore's real concern, namely to refute the idea that the stars can fall. Their reflected light may be drowned out by the radiance of daylight, but they merely appear to vanish, as is evident during a solar eclipse, when they are temporarily visible. In Chapter 25 he adds that falling stars are optical illusions—just fragments of celestial fire that rain down from the ether and are blown about by the winds.

Isidore frames his discussion of the names of the constellations (Ch. 26) with considerable caution. Job 38:31–32 indeed refers to the constellations by pagan mythological names, but this just proves that they are nothing more than conventional labels, like the planetary names of the weekdays. While constellation legends are part of late antique astronomical tradition (notably in Hyginus), and also reflect Isidore's dependence on literary scholia, it is nonetheless worth remarking that he did not have to include this information at all. To be sure, most of the star names in this chapter are the ones found in the passage from Job, which gives the chapter the air of an exegetical aid. But if this catalogue of star names was supposed to aid the reader of Scripture, it exceeded its mandate, for it includes Boötes and Sirius, which are not in the Bible. Neither Sirius nor comets (Ch. 26.15) are given allegorical meanings, and Isidore's motivation for including them is obscure. Sirius, it can be argued, fits into Isidore's strategy of replacing mythological origins with explanations focussed on astro-meteorology:[55] as the Pleiades and Orion delimit the summer and winter seasons, so does Sirius mark the height of summer heat. But Sirius shares with the comet an implied malevolence, because it "burns." Isidore's reader is thus nudged towards the problem of whether stars have souls (Ch. 27).

Given Isidore's views on astral worship and astrology, it is disconcerting to find him entertaining this question, and in such an inconclusive way. Yet his agnostic stance is precisely that of his source, Augustine's The Literal Interpretation of Genesis. Augustine's reserve reflects a vigorous Patristic controversy on this topic. Origen endorsed the Platonic idea that the stars were animated beings, and Jerome in his commentary on Ecclesiastes seems to back him up; Basil and others argued that the stars were not alive, but were corporeal bodies propelled by intelligent spiritual beings. Isidore lays out both these possibilities but adds a third scenario proposed by Augustine, namely that the stars are purely material entities.[56] Isidore is not impressed by the materialist option, but if stars have souls, what will become of them at the resurrection? Isidore does not answer this question, or even explain its implications. Was he in contact with Jewish circles in Spain who held that the stars were angels whose judgement was reserved to the end of time?[57] Or is his question a distant echo of the controversy surrounding Origen's speculations that our bodies after the resurrection will be similar in some way to the bodies of the stars?[58]

The remainder of On the Nature of Things is devoted to meteorology in the Aristotelian sense: atmospheric conditions, the behaviour of waters, earthquakes, and volcanoes. Isidore's focus on the stars as indicators of seasonal weather conditions prepares the reader for this transition and bridges the time-reckoning of the opening chapters to the terrestrial phenomena with which the book closes. The exposition follows the vertical hierarchy of air (Chs 29–39), water (Chs 40–44), and earth (Chs 45–48). Within the airy zone, Isidore chooses to start with phenomena which have traditionally provoked scientific curiosity and debate, but also fear and "superstition": thunder (Ch. 29), lightning (Ch. 30), and the rainbow (Ch. 31). This is followed by explanations of more commonplace weather conditions: clouds (Ch. 32), rain (Ch. 33), snow (Ch. 34), and hail (Ch. 35). The explanation of hail shows how Isidore could go beyond his sources by explaining not only its formation (which Aristotle covered in Meterologica 1.11.347b28) but its fall, and its spherical shape. No single source can account for all of his information. Isidore states that the round shape of hail is due to the warmth of the Sun, plus the slow descent of the hail through the atmosphere. Seneca (Natural Questions 4B.3) also invokes a prolonged fall but does not mention the Sun, and he thinks that hail is round because water droplets are globular.[59]

Linking the atmosphere to the heavens above and the solid earth beneath are the winds (Chs 36–37), and Chapter 38 on "Signs of Storms or Fair Weather" follows logically on the winds. Extrapolation of weather predictions from prevailing winds as well as the rising and setting of prominent constellations lies in the deepest substrate of ancient observation about the physical world and forms the foundation of classical meteorology.[60] To these were added the appearance of the sky itself, as well as the behaviour of animals. When it comes to the aspect and colour of the Sun and Moon, Isidore claims as his authority Publius Nigidius Figulus (d. 45 B.C.), whom Jerome in his Chronicon called a Pythagorean and a magus because of his interest in divination. However, Isidore disinfects his source by explaining that changes to these planets are the consequence of thickening air, and hence a natural result of atmospheric conditions; and for good measure he quotes Christ's words in Luke 12.55: "If in the evening the sky is red, in the morning it will be fair weather. If in the morning the gloomy sky is red, there will be a storm." Weather prognostication, somewhat like medical prognosis, was treated in antiquity as an inference from natural signs, and not as a form of divination; this probably contributed to its easy adoption by Christians, and Isidore's casual juxtaposition of Nigidius with Christ speaks to this hospitable attitude.[61] Nonetheless, Bede dropped this chapter of On the Nature of Things from his own book of the same title, and he sharply attacked Isidore's notion that the angle of the horns of the Moon can presage weather in Chapter 25 of The Reckoning of Time.[62]

Given the role of pestilence in the Bible as God's signature punishment for sin, as well as its association with guilty "pollution" in ancient Greek literature, it is interesting that Isidore concentrates on the Hippocratic model of pestilence as natural epidemic disease, caused by averse atmospheric conditions. Pestilence "strikes" (a term that carries a valence of punishment) "because of mankind's sins," but Isidore merely ascribes this view to "some people." Properly, it is "from some [natural] cause," namely the corruption of the atmosphere through an excess of one of the four elemental qualities of heat, cold, moisture, and dryness. The air envelops the whole earth, the corruption is borne on the winds, and everything that comes into contact ("contagion") with it is

"infected" or tainted. Pestilentia is primarily a problem with the air itself, and not the humans who were made sick by it.[63] Isidore also records the view of "others" that wind-borne "plague-bearing seeds (semina)" cause pestilence; his source here is Lucretius' De rerum natura 6.1090–132, who argues that plague is just exposure to an unfamiliar ailment that is endemic in some other part of the world.

In chapters 40–44, Isidore moves into the element of water, first to explain tides (Ch. 40) and then to answer questions about why the sea does not increase in size (Ch. 41) and why its waters are bitter (Ch. 42), with multiple hypotheses and models. The anomalous flooding of the Nile in summer (Ch. 43) had been an object of speculation for many ancient savants, and Isidore here opts for Lucretius' theory (De natura rerum 6.712–37) that it is the consequence of the contrary force of the Etesian winds from the north.

On the Nature of Things closes with the earth but remains within the conceptual world of meteorology. Chapter 45 unravels another scientific problem: the heavy spherical earth is surrounded on all sides by an envelope of lighter air, so how does it remain stable? Ambrose's answer is that the Creator "suspended the earth in the void (in nihilo)" so that it hangs in space. Isidore prefers to align Ambrose with "the philosophers" (e.g. Pliny, Natural History 2.4.10) who argue that the earth floats on a mass of thick air. In the end, Isidore concludes that both models are equally reasonable, and equally unprovable. This is the second time that he invokes the mystery of God's creative plan to bring closure to an argument, the other being the discussion of the tides in Chapter 40. Alternative explanations are also on offer for earthquakes (Ch. 46)—winds gusting through subterranean caverns, collapsing underground caves, and buried rivers—but Isidore this time declares a preference for the wind theory that Lucretius (6.577–84) borrowed from Aristotle. While Isidore turned to a work of history for his information on Mount Etna (Ch. 47)—Justinus's Epitome of Pompeius Trogus—his account accords with the model prevalent in scientific accounts. Winds, once again, are the principal cause.[64]

The final chapter of On the Nature of Things presents two pictures of Earth. The first depicts the planet in the centre of the universe, while the second represents the inhabited lands, as these were known to the ancients. Isidore likewise visualizes the oekumene in two different ways. From Hyginus he derives a mental map of three continents separated by conspicuous bodies of water; from Augustine, he borrows the more abstract concept of the continents occupying sectors defined by the cardinal directions. Finally, he cites Ambrose's geometrical formula: Asia occupies half the world, Europe and Africa the other half. Manuscripts of On the Nature of Things are the oldest witnesses to a form of stylized map that encompasses all three of these approaches: the so-called T-O map of the inhabited lands of Earth. This "map" is in fact a diagram or schema that represents the land mass of the known world as a disk (the O) divided horizontally, and with its lower half bisected vertically (the T). Whether Isidore devised, or even knew of, such a map is the subject of debate, but there is no controversy over the role of On the Nature of Things in its exceptional medieval diffusion and influence.[65]

3.1 Etymologies (1): The disciplinae

Something important about Isidore's project in the Etymologies would be lost if we simply plucked the information we thought pertinent to science without paying attention to the larger structure of the work. The first ten books march beneath the banner of disciplina, which is also the first word of book 1. Disciplinae are first and foremost the liberal arts: the trivium of grammar, rhetoric, and logic, and the quadrivium of the mathematical sciences.[66] While the quadrivium is our focus here, it is important to remember that Isidore saw the whole ensemble of the arts as a program that prepared the mind to rise to "contemplation of what is above."[67] Taking his cue from Varro, Isidore added two learned professions—medicine and law—to the arts. Medicine comes within the purview of science both for its object and its methods, but law, it will be recalled, is the arena in which Isidore chooses to discuss time-reckoning. For the Christian, "what is above" is revelation, the true philosophy revealed by God, his angels and saints, and the Scriptures and the Church (books 6–8). This first half of the Etymologies, which begins with grammar, ends with languages (book 9) and an alphabetical dictionary (book 10).

The second group of ten books opens with the word natura at the head of the book devoted to human psychology and the human body. Book 11 ends in a discussion of monstrous births, which bridges to book 12, on animals. At this point, Isidore turns to the "system of the world" outlined in On the Nature of Things, beginning with the heavens, atmosphere, and waters (book 13), and surveying the geography of Earth (book 14). We will not be following him into the human-built environment (cities, farms, and roads) of book 15, but will reconnect with his "inventory of nature" in book 16 (metals and stones) and book 17 (crops, vines, trees, and herbs). Indeed, Isidore considers the vegetable kingdom under the rubric of agriculture, and book 17 opens a suite of books on other crafts and their gear.

We will first consider Isidore's treatment of the mathematical disciplines in book 3 and medicine in book 4; and then, in defiance of his own order, we will examine the "inventory of nature" before revisiting the "system of the world." While acknowledging the significance, subtlety, and originality of Isidore's etymological method,[68] we will (following the example of his medieval readers) concentrate on the information he conveys.[69] Nonetheless, the method and the content cannot be disentangled, because unlike On the Nature of Things, the Etymologies is not committed to providing explanations or answers to questions; its mandate is to define what things are, based on their names.

Merrills, "Isidore's Etymologies," 311–13 argues that Henderson overstates the coherence of the etymological method, and points out that it is not, in fact, sustained throughout Etymologies. Etymology would remain a privileged medieval mode of presenting information, but would not again be used as the ordering principle of an encyclopedia (Ribémont, Les origines, 85). See also the chapter by Jacques Elfassi in the present volume.

[69] Isidore's etymological method was directly relevant in certain contexts, for example the debate of signs and images in the Liber Caroli discussed by Laura Carlson, "Adoption, Adaptation, and Authority: the Use of Isidore in the Opus Caroli," in Isidore of Seville and his Reception, eds. Fear and Wood, 210–30. On the other hand, readers of the Etymologies' scientific sections tended to excerpt the information without the etymologies. Early Irish references to Isidore's computistics and anatomical terminology are cases in point: Marina Smyth, "Isidorian Texts in Seventh-Century Ireland," in Isidore of Seville and his Reception, eds. Fear and Wood, 119 and 121.

Isidore's etymological method had a strong impact on the mathematical disciplines of book 3.[70] Although his argument promises to investigate the principles (causae) of the four sciences, he passes over arithmetical operations, geometrical theorems, and astronomical models, concentrating instead on expounding terminology and classificatory schemes. The section on arithmetic, for example (3.1–9), is about the properties of numbers—odd and even, prime and compound, "superfluous," "diminutive," and "perfect" (i.e. the sum of their factors) (3.5); superpartient and superparticular and their minor homologues (3.6); and discrete, continuous, linear, planar, and solid (3.7). In the midst of this catalogue, however, Isidore inserts a remarkable encomium of arithmetic's sacred and secular worth:

> The theory (ratio) of numbers ought not to be despised, for in many passages of sacred writings it elucidates how great a mystery they hold. Not for nothing is it said in praise of God (Wisdom 11:21), "Thou has ordered all things in measure, and number, and weight." The [number] that contains six units (senarius), which is perfect in its own parts, declares the completion (perfectionem) of the world by a certain signification of its number. Likewise for the forty days during which Moses and Elijah and the Lord himself fasted: without an understanding of numbers, the span of days is unintelligible. So also there are other numbers in the Sacred Scriptures whose figurative meaning cannot be resolved except by those skilled in the knowledge of the mathematical art. It is even our lot to depend on the discipline of numbers to some extent when through it we name the hours, when we dispute about the course of the months, and when we recognize the duration of the turning year. Indeed, through numbers we are provided with the means to avoid confusion. Remove numbers from all things, and everything perishes. Remove computation (conputum) from the world, and blind ignorance embraces all things; those who are ignorant of the method of calculation cannot be differentiated from the other animals.[71]

This ode to number closely echoes the opening word of Isidore's Book of Numbers (Liber numerorum): "To pay attention to the principles [causas] underlying the numbers found in Scripture is not superfluous."[72] Like On the Nature of Things the Book of Numbers is a ground-breaking work: the first Christian handbook of number symbolism. Much of its material finds its way into Etymologies book 3. However, the Etymologies is not concerned with what numbers signify as much as with how they are signified by their names and classificatory affiliations.[73] It is also interesting to note that the quotation from Wisdom 11:21 appears again in book 17 of the Etymologies on stones and metals, where it opens the discussion of Roman units of weight and volumetric measures. The metaphysical measurement of mathematics is separate from the practical world of corporeal objects, "each … ruled by its own weight."[74]

Isidore's discussion of "infinite numbers" (3.9) is an interesting illustration of how he extracted scientific data from Patristic sources, leaving their theological arguments behind. Numbers are infinite, Isidore argues, because however large a number one can imagine, one can always add to it, or even multiply it an unlimited number of times. His source here is Augustine's City of God 12.19, but Isidore effaces Augustine's argument, which was to prove to skeptics that God's knowledge is infinite, because he has knowledge of all numbers, and numbers are infinite.[75] Significantly, the Etymologies situate the infinite number directly after a discussion of different kinds of ratio, in increasing order of complexity—arithmetical, geometrical, and harmonic—as if capping this progression.[76] Certainly the order of ratios was important to Isidore, as it inspired him to alter the received order of the disciplines of the quadrivium. Boethius and Cassiodorus both adopted an epistemological sequence—arithmetic deals with number per se, music with number in ratio, geometry with number extended in space, and astronomy with number in motion—while Martianus placed "Harmony" at the end of his series after astronomy, as it symbolizes the transcendent perfection of the heavenly realm. Isidore's argumentum or summary introduction to book 3 announces the Boethius-Cassiodorus order; but in the text, he follows his "ratio order."[77]

Isidore's definition of geometry is a creative mosaic of phrases from Augustine's De ordine and Cicero's De oratore: "The art of this discipline is concerned with line, distances, sizes and shapes, and the dimensions and numbers found in shapes."[78] But his brief treatment of geometry contains no theorems or proofs; he seems unacquainted with Euclid, save for the division of geometry into planes, measurable magnitudes, rational magnitudes, and solids, which was channelled through Cassiodorus.[79] Indeed, Isidore is concerned exclusively with defining figures and shapes, and only gestures towards mathematics when he deals with geometric ratios (3.13).

The mutation of geometry into the literal "measuring the earth" (3.10.3) is echoed by Isidore's definition of music as "the practical knowledge (peritia) of modulation" that "consists of sound and song."[80] Isidore stands on the threshold of a profound transformation of music theory. For Augustine (notably in De ordine) and Boethius, music was still the classical Pythagorean-Platonic contemplation of mathematical proportion; its goal was to raise the soul above the realm of the sensual and corporeal so that it could grasp rational truth and cosmic harmony. The true musician was the philosopher who could judge the fundamental essences of music, not the performer or composer. Isidore (leaning on Cassiodorus) articulates a new Christian vision of music based on the exalted role of performed music in the Bible (especially the Psalms), and the centrality of singing in the worship of the Church. He gives a brief nod to the notion of cosmic harmony (3.1.1), but his account bypasses mathematics completely in favour of catalogues of instruments and terminology—except, tellingly, for a closing chapter on musical ratios.[81]

Mathematics seems to be reinstated when Isidore turns to astronomy. Whoever discovered astronomy—the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, Abraham, or the Greeks—> was stirred by the movement of the heavens and prompted by the reasoning of his mind, and through the changing of the seasons, through the fixed and defined courses of the stars, through the measured expanses of their distances apart, he made observations of certain dimensions and numbers.[82]

In practice, however, the account of astronomy is a description of the shape of the cosmos—a sphere (3.30), with planetary spheres nested within (3.32), that rotates on its axis (3.33–36), and is marked off into regions, hemispheres, and circles (3.43–45). Size only comes up when discussing the relative magnitude of the Sun, Moon, and Earth (3.48–49). The few references to measured time are less than satisfying: in 3.57, the Moon is said to traverse the same distance in "thirty days" (a rough approximation) as the Sun travels in 365, and in 3.66, Isidore gives the same bewildering figures for the courses of the planets through the zodiac as he relayed in On the Nature of Things.[83] The catalogue of star names (3.71), on the other hand, is a richly detailed mosaic of lore culled from Servius' commentary on the Aeneid, the Latin Aratus, Cicero, Cassiodorus, and extensive reading of Augustine. It ends with a denunciation of astrology (mathesis) that echoes the beginning of this section (3.27). Not only the Fathers, but even "Plato, Aristotle, and others among the pagans" condemned astral determinism and its corollary, the abnegation of free will. The study of the stars is not for "harmful computations," but to stimulate us to turn from material to heavenly things (3.39, 41).

Varro's great encyclopedia enlarged the liberal arts by adding architecture and medicine, two professions which claimed a foundation in science. Isidore retains only medicine, which he explicitly calls an "art" and which he treats as he does the other arts, first by defining it, and then by relating its "inventors" and history.[84] Medicine's privileged status in the Etymologies, and its position directly following astronomy, may reflect Cassiodorus' commendation of cosmography and medicine in the part of the Institutions devoted to "divine letters" (1.25, 1.31).[85] However, the closing chapter of book 4 goes well beyond

Cassiodorus's praise of medical care as practical piety. Isidore asks why the art of medicine is not included with "the other liberal disciplines." His unexpected answer is that it is because medicine includes and deploys all the liberal arts: grammar to read its books; rhetoric to compose case histories; dialectic to deduce cures from causes; arithmetic to track the periodicity of fevers; geometry to assess the quality of places; music for therapy; and astronomy to observe the changes of the seasons that affect the human body. "Thus medicine is called the Second Philosophy, for each discipline claims for itself the entire human: by philosophy the soul is cured; by medicine, the body."[86] This encomium is quoted in a spirited defence of medicine in the 9th-century manuscript compendium known as the Lorscher Arzneibuch,[87] and finds echoes in the medieval iconography of personified Medicine as the recipient of wisdom at the hands of Philosophy and Mathematics.[88] The exalted position Isidore granted medicine also played a role in its transformation into physica in the 12th century.[89] It also proved difficult for medieval readers to resist supplementing book 4 with additional materials on the history of medicine, and the parts of the human body.[90]

Isidore defines medicine as both therapeutic action against healing and wounds, and preventive advice about nutrition, clothing, and shelter. It thus becomes an encompassing guide to right living; this is reinforced by its etymology from "moderation" (modus), with its associations of virtue and wisdom.[91] His definition of health and illness is grounded in the Hippocratic-Galenic model of the four bodily humours, which are in turn linked to the four elements (4.5). The bulk of book 4, however, is divided between two topics: diseases and remedies. Isidore adopts a broadly Methodist classification of ailments into acute diseases (4.6), chronic diseases (4.7), and skin conditions (4.8), but discussion of disease is dominated by etymology: the name denotes the symptom and the symptom justifies the name.[92] Nonetheless, Isidore's knowledge of medical science should not be underestimated: his sources range from the Latin commentary on Hippocrates' Aphorisms to the compilation on acute diseases called Aurelius, from Vegetius's work on veterinary medicine Digesta artis mulomedicinalis, to pseudo-Soranus' Quaestiones medicinales, Ambrose's Hexaemeron, and the letters of Jerome.[93] His grasp of some specialized topics, like melancholy, is quite sophisticated.[94] His discussion of therapeutic remedies (4.9) conveys the Hippocratic order of resort from regimen, through drugs, to surgery, and briefly discusses curing by opposites and similars, before launching into a catalogue of remedies, forms of medical literature (4.10), and tools (4.11).

3.2 Etymologies (2): The Inventory of Nature

The book on medicine was often paired with book 11, "On the human being and on portents," by medieval (and modern) readers, because book 11 covers human anatomy, physiology, psychology, and embryology. However, Isidore consults almost no medical sources for this book, apart from pseudo-Soranus' Quaestiones medicinales. Instead, he leans heavily on Lactantius (Institutiones, De opificio Dei),[95] supplemented by Augustine, Ambrose's Hexaemeron, Tertullian, and above all, Servius's glosses on Virgil. When he turns to monsters in the second half of the book, he draws on Augustine's City of God 16.8, and Solinus.[96] In consequence, book 11 strikes a more metaphysical and moral tone than book 4.

Book 11 begins with the soul (anima), will (animus), mind (mens), memory, reasoning, and sensation (11.1.7–13).[97] These form a hierarchy, with sensation as the link between soul and body. The body in turn is an epitome of the four elements: earth (flesh), air (breath), water (blood), and fire (vital heat) (11.1.16).

[97] On Isidore's classification of psychological functions, see Fontaine, Isidore culture, 689–92.

Hence Isidore treats the senses (11.1.18–24) separately from the organs of sensation, which are lodged in the head (11.1.25). The hierarchical principle now becomes structural. Isidore begins with the crown (vertex) of the head, where the hairs grow in a whorl (11.1.26), and inches his way down to the temples, to the eyes, cheeks, and jaw before turning to the ears, nostrils, and mouth. After reaching the feet, he turns to the internal organs: the heart, vessels, lungs, liver, spleen, intestines, uterus, and bladder. Throughout this survey, his etymological method supports a kind of teleological reasoning, mixed with allusions to the exceptional stature of the human being as the pinnacle of creation. The neck (collum), for example, is a like a column (columns) "carrying the head and sustaining it as if it were a citadel"; the fingers (digiti) take their name either from the "perfect number" ten (decem) or because their arrangement is seemly (decenter), and so on.[98] By contrast, there is almost no structural description of human anatomy or discussion of physiology: for example, in the chapter on the heart (11.1.118), the two main vessels are mentioned but not given distinctive names. The left one contains "more blood" and the right "more air," but Isidore does not explain what venous and arterial blood do, or the role that the heart plays in the genesis and regulation of vital heat.

A short discussion of embryology (11.1.143) ushers in a section on the life cycle (11.2). This is also Isidore's opportunity to discuss gender differences (11.2.17–28), though gender in fact permeates book 11: there are distinctive terms for men's and women's hair (11.1.28) and lips (11.1.50), and the very word femina comes from the thigh (femur), whose structure differentiates the sexes (11.1.106).[99]

Generation and embryology also cue the second half of book 11, on portents. A portent is an "unnatural being" (portenuosus), though Isidore distinguishes between the "normal abnormal" (such as a person with six fingers), and a "being of transformed appearance" (11.3.6). The latter include humans who are part animal (11.3.9), or who exhibit the attributes of both sexes (11.3.11). However, "abnormality" is problematic when whole races of "monstrous" people presumably reproduce after their kind (11.3.12–27).[100] Finally, there are the purely imaginary monsters of pagan fable, like the Sirens or Cerberus, "which do not exist but are concocted to interpret the causes of things."[101] But if Isidore is skeptical about the Hydra or the Chimaera, he treats stories about metamorphosis in a more neutral manner, rather as he discusses the monstrous races. He ends with a note on creatures which undergo natural mutation, like bees or beetles that emerge from rotting flesh (11.4.3).

The mixture of human and animal in the monsters of book 11 sets the stage for Isidore's survey of animals in book 12. Isidore's classification of animals has excited considerable interest.[102] He begins by invoking Adam's naming of the animals, and the classification seems structured by terminology: livestock (pecus) and draft animals (iumenta) (12.1), "beasts" (bestiae) (12.2), "small animals" (12.3), snakes (12.4), "vermin" (12.5), fish (12.6), birds (12.7), and "tiny flying animals"—essentially insects (12.8). This order broadly replicates that of Pliny's Natural History books 8–11, but Isidore offers us several ways to read this sequence. Adam's naming of the animals suggests an orientation based on the relationship of animal to human: hence domesticates come first. The presence of the dog amongst the bestiae, however, hints that the distinction is also between herbivores and carnivores.[103] Size matters as well, but the small animals of 12.3 (mice, moles, and their like, but also crickets) all share the habit of living underground, so "smaller" also means "lower." "Vermin" are the least animal of animals, because they generate spontaneously; but they are also disgusting and frightening creatures, like spiders, leeches, lice, and maggots. When he comes to fish,[104] however, Isidore insists that their name (piscis) is related to pecus, or "livestock" (12.6.1): implicitly, then, the first five chapters dealt with the animals that live on the earth, and now he begins anew with water animals. Fish are more problematic for Isidore, however, because their names, and thus their natures and classification, are less sharply delineated than those of land animals. Land animals were named before fish, because fish are less visible; thus, many water animals take their names from the land animals they resemble (12.4.4). It is almost with a sense of relief that Isidore turns to birds, which are grouped under a single generic term, though they vary considerably in their nature (12.7.1). On the other hand, Isidore does not use Pliny's term insecta for the bees, wasps, moths, and flies of 12.8.

Within this complex articulation of the animal kingdom, Isidore integrates a wide range of lore from Pliny[105] as well as his more ubiquitous sources: Servius, Ambrose, and Solinus. The issue of whether he used the Latin Physiologus, either directly or indirectly, is a matter for debate, as he does not propose any symbolic or allegorical interpretations.[106] On the other hand, the book on animals provides considerable detail. Compared, for example, to the discussion of human anatomy in book 11, there is a wealth of information here (albeit unevenly distributed) about the appearance, habitat, and behaviour of animals. For example, the chapter on snakes closes with a lengthy treatment of venom, hibernation, self-regeneration after wounding, vision, and locomotion in snakes, and their habit of shedding their skin. In consequence, this book of the Etymologies contributed a substantial share of the Middle Ages' knowledge about animals, particularly before the recovery of Aristotle's biological works in the 13th century.[107]

Etymologies book 16 on minerals also exerted a huge influence on the later encyclopedias and lapidaries,[108] and for much the same reason, namely, that besides etymologizing the name, it also describes characteristics, locations, and uses. Sometimes the etymology is omitted altogether, such as in the section on bitumen (16.2.1), which nonetheless dilates on how it is gathered on the surface of the Dead Sea, how it cannot be broken (save by menstrual blood), and how it is used to caulk ships.[109] Book 16 also contains numerous tantalizing references to how magicians use stones, as well as memorable anecdotes, like the story of the man who invented unbreakable glass and was executed for his pains by the emperor Tiberius, lest his invention drive down the value of gold and silver. Isidore's classification of stones and metals, by contrast, is somewhat neutral. He starts with mineral substances that are the products of earth itself—dust, mud, clay, but also sulphur (16.1)—and then turns to those that come from water, notably salt (16.2). Stones (lapides) are divided into "ordinary" (vulgares: 16.3) and "more important" (insigniores: 16.4), that is, with remarkable qualities, like the magnet. Marble merits a chapter of its own (16.5), but gemstones are classified by colour: green (16.7), red (16.8), purple (16.9), white (16.10), black (16.11), varicoloured (16.12), crystalline (16.13), fiery (16.14), and golden (16.15). Glass (16.16) bridges the gems with the metals: gold (16.18), silver (16.19), bronze (16.20), iron (16.21), lead (16.22), tin (16.23), and electrum (16.24). Book 16 ends with an important synopsis of Roman weights and volumetric measurements, which was often excerpted on its own.

In book 17, plants are situated within the context of "rural affairs" (de rebus rusticis), which, like the liberal arts or medicine, has "inventors" and a systematic body of literature (17.1). That being said, the bulk of the book is a catalogue of the plant kingdom. Unlike the animals of book 12, however, Isidore's plants are only those cultivated or exploited by humans, and the accent is overwhelmingly on vocabulary, rather than a description of the actual plant. Nonetheless, details concerning vine-dressing (17.5) and grafting (17.6.11) slip in, as well as comments on the qualities of different varieties of fruit. The chapters on exotic trees and spices (16.8–9) are rather more expansive; Isidore's remarks on the adulteration of black pepper (16.8.8) and balsam (16.8.14) suggest one reason why they are more expansive, but he can also presume less familiarity with the plant on the part of his readers. "Aromatic or common plants" (16.9) covers a wide spectrum from flowers like iris and rose, to weeds like burdock (16.9.66), and plants cultivated for their medicinal qualities. Two chapters on garden vegetables (17.10) and culinary herbs (17.11) close the series.

The sources of book 17 are quite diverse: Servius and Solinus, and the Fathers, notably Ambrose, are still Isidore's mainstays, but he also draws on Roman works on husbandry by Columella and Palladius. Gargilius Martialis's Medicine from Vegetables and Fruits (Medicina ex oleribus et pomis) bridges horticulture and medicine, but Isidore's medico-botanical reading is more difficult to get into focus. He may have used one or more translations or reworkings of Diocorides. The total absence of Pliny is remarkable.[110]

3.3 Etymologies (3): The System of the World Revisited

Between book 12 on animals and book 16 on stones and metals lie two books which reprise themes from On the Nature of Things: book 13 on the "world-system," and book 14 on "earth and its parts," comprising both the disposition of lands and regions, and physical features like islands, promontories, and mountains. Fontaine finds the positioning of this material significant: a survey of the macrocosm to parallel the microcosm of the human body in book 11.[111] But this ignores the role of the animals of book 12, which form an ascending ladder from terrestrial animals, to marine animals, and finally to the birds of the air. Books 13 and 14 literally bring us down from the sky to the earth again, where we can consider the products of the earth, namely metals and plants.

Book 13 begins on a grandiose note with a definition of the universe (mundus) that encompasses the whole of creation (13.1). The discussion of the four cardinal directions (13.1.3–8) seems to echo the book on astronomy (cf. 3.43), but Isidore will not tarry long in the heavens. The two classic theories of the structure of matter, namely atomism (13.2) and element theory (13.3), are laid out in a dry and didactic manner, but it is evidently the latter of which Isidore (and his source, Lactantius) approves, for it reflects the architecture of creation:

> The elements are assigned by Divine Providence to the appropriate living beings, for the Creator himself has filled heaven [i.e. the fiery realm] with angels, air with birds, water with fish, and earth with humans and the rest of the living things.[112]

After three chapters on the structure of the celestial sphere (13.4–6; cf. 3.21–44), Isidore turns to "meteorology." The order mirrors that of On the Nature of Things quite closely:

Etym. 13	On the Nature of Things
7. Air and clouds	32. Clouds
8. Thunder	29. Thunder
9. Lightning	30. Lightning
10. The rainbow and phenomena of clouds [including rain, hail, and snow]	31. The rainbow; 33. Rains; 34. Snow; 35. Hail
11. Winds	36.–37. Winds
12. Waters	–
13. Different kinds of water	cf. 42. Why the sea has bitter waters
14. The sea	44. The names of the sea and the rivers

Etym. 13	On the Nature of Things
15. The Ocean	cf. 40. The Ocean's tide
16. The Mediterranean Sea	cf. 44. The names of the sea and the rivers
17. Gulfs of the sea	cf. 44. The names of the sea and the rivers
18. Tides and straits	cf. 40. The Ocean's tide
19. Lakes and pools	–
20. The abyss	44. The names of the sea and the rivers
21. Rivers	cf. 43. The river Nile
22. Floods	–

Isidore is generally not interested in considering problems in the Etymologies: for example, he does not bring up the "waters above the firmament" or explain why the sea is salt. On the other hand, his discussion of weather phenomena relates how lightning and rainbows are produced. The chapter on the Mediterranean is an opportunity for an extended tour of "the Great Sea," strewn with nuggets of history and mythology, while Chapter 21 opens onto a gazetteer of rivers, reading from the Niles and Ganges in the east to Isidore's own Guadalquivir in southern Spain.

Book 14 follows a similar trajectory, from Asia westwards to Europe and then to Africa, and within each of these continents, from east to west in two "sweeps," first through the south, and then through the north. Asia, for example, begins in the earthly Paradise (14.3.2–4) and then moves from India, through Parthia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine to Egypt. Isidore then returns east to trace a line from China through Scythia, Hyrcania, Albania (i.e. Georgia), Armenia, Asia Minor, Phrygia, and Pamphilia, ending in Cilicia.[113] Etymology becomes a key to history, as the names of places are often derived from eponymous founders, or aboriginal peoples.[114] After the continents come the islands (14.4). Here, the west-to-east order is abandoned in favour of a periphery-to-centre axis, beginning with the British Isles and the Atlantic islands, leaping to the islands of the Indian Ocean, and coming to rest in the Mediterranean, whose islands are once again enumerated from east to west. Isidore's geography is remarkably sophisticated in its grasp of spatial order and the contiguity of provinces and regions, but it also innovates with respect to his sources. Unlike Orosius or Solinus, he makes no distinction between the Roman Empire and the lands beyond. Isidore's is a truly Christian and universal geography.[115]

Book 14 ends with gazetteers of promontories (14.7); landforms, like mountains and mountain ranges, hills, woods, groves, and miscellaneous "places"; coastal features (14.8); and finally subterranean structures, from caves to Gehenna (14.9). The survey of the world that began with the encomium of the universe in all its fullness and fairness ends, literally, in hell. For Isidore's Christian geography is also a moral macrocosm: "Just as the heart of an animal is in its centre, so also the underworld is said to be in the centre of the earth," and the infernal regions (inferi) are so called "because souls are carried (ferre) there from here."[116]

4 Conclusion

Patrick Gautier Dalché characterizes Isidore's Etymologies, in a felicitous oxymoron, as an "original compilation,"[117] and the description applies equally well to On the Nature of Things. It also allows us to reframe Isidore's science by moving beyond its oft-cited weaknesses and lacunae, and considering its larger purpose. Isidore was the first Christian intellectual to attempt to give a full account of the material creation in both its grand architecture and its manifold and diverse contents, and to join, and (in part) integrate this knowledge with the disciplines of the quadrivium. The sheer scope and methodical perseverance of his scientific writing gave medieval Europe not only a treasury of information about the created world, but a capacious and ambitious way of imagining scientific knowledge as a conversation between mathematics, the world-system, and the inventories of natural history.[118] By his practice of compilation, Isidore also quietly, even surreptitiously, persuaded his readers that Christian truth and classical science could collaborate in shaping a new model of erudition.[119]

CHAPTER 8

Isidore of Seville as a Grammarian

José Carracedo Fraga

1 Introduction

Isidore of Seville was born into a Hispano-Roman family of noble origin, and as such, he had access to a well-rounded education. It was his brother Leander, twenty years his senior, monk and then bishop of Seville (c.578–c.601), who oversaw a great part of his schooling; Leander was, indubitably, the most prominent personality within the culture of Visigothic Iberia at the end of the 6th century. Grammatical studies were accorded the utmost importance at the school in Seville where Isidore was a student, as well as in other Visigothic-era institutions cemented in a more classical tradition. As a result, this school of thought not only shaped Isidore's education but also his way of understanding instruction, the acquisition of knowledge, and thus his vast literary work, which focused on comprehensive instruction for the clergy. Grammar, thought of as an "all-encompassing science" ("una ciencia totalitaria"), is therefore an essential element to describe and understand the person of Isidore, and his concern for the intellectual and spiritual instruction of readers of his writings and teachings.[1]

2 Isidore's Grammatical Programme

An entire book addressing grammatical concepts is found at the beginning of Isidore's universal encyclopaedia of all knowledge, called the Etymologiae.

[1] The correct and successful expression "la gramática ciencia totalitaria" concerning Isidore is taken from Eleuterio Elorduy, "San Isidoro, unidad orgánica de su educación reflejada en sus escritos, la gramática ciencia totalitaria," in Miscellanea Isidoriana. Homenaje a S. Isidoro de Sevilla en el XIII centenario de su muerte (Rome: 1936), 293–322. On Isidore's education and the influence of his brother Leander, see the chapter by Purificación Ubric Rabaneda in this volume. An excellent description of the Visigothic schooling in general and that of Isidore is found in Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz, "Introducción general," in José Oroz Reta and Manuel A. Marcos Casquero, trans., San Isidoro de Sevilla, Etimologías (Madrid: 2004), 70–94 and 104–06.

Isidore himself provides a reason for this (Etym. 1.5.1):[2] "Grammar is the knowledge of speaking correctly, and is the origin and foundation of liberal letters." Grammar is the origin and foundation of all education. In other words, the entire formative process is based on grammar, and without grammar one cannot acquire knowledge. A good command of a language is vital to have access to any other sphere of knowledge, as it is only through language and words that we can interpret reality. The method that Isidore utilizes to create his great work is just a grammatical element: the etymology. However, this way of understanding grammar is not exclusive to the Sevillian erudite; it relates precisely to early scholastic instruction and had, within the Christian context, important promoters, such as Augustine of Hippo and Cassiodorus. Both authors are found among the ones that most inspired Isidore, and to the former he owes his definition of grammar cited above.[3]

The first book of the Etymologiae is, as mentioned, a complete grammatical manual despite having been written with the synthesis and brevity that characterize the encyclopedia and Isidore's work more generally.[4] Its main inspiration is the treatises of Aelius Donatus, a key referent for grammarians during the late Middle Ages.[5] It includes the three major themes defined in each of the three books of the Ars maior from the Roman teacher: the minor elements of language (littera, syllaba, pedes, toni, positurae), the eight parts of speech, or

[2] "Grammatica est scientia recte loquendi, et origo et fundamentum liberalium litterarum." I quote the text of the Etymologiae from the edition by Wallace M. Lindsay, Isidori Hispalensis episcopi Etymologiarum sive Originum libri XX, 2 vols (Oxford: 1911). All the translations of the Latin texts are mine. Jacques Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique, 2nd ed. (Paris: 1983), 53–54, talks about how Isidore intentionally uses the same word origo to define grammar and etymology alike (origo vocabulorum: "origin of words," Etymologiae 1.29.1). The importance of grammar is clearly emphasized, as it constitutes the introduction of Isidore's great encyclopaedia and he allocated much more space to this subject than to any other of the liberal arts.

[3] Besides having penned works that were specifically grammatical, Augustine insists, in many of his texts, on the importance of grammatical instruction as a foundation of all general culture and especially Christianity. Cassiodorus offers his educational plan in his Institutiones, and in the second book of this work he gives special attention to grammar. The definition of grammar Isidore copied is found in Institutiones 2.praef. see also Cassiodorus Variae 9.21.

[4] On the role of brevity in Isidore's work see the chapter by Graham Barrett in this volume.

[5] Despite the fact that Isidore cited his sources very seldom, on four occasions he mentions Donatus in the first book of the Etymologiae (6.1; 16.2, where he directly recommends lege Donatum, "read Donatus"; 33.4; 37.1). To learn of Donatus's importance during the Middle Ages, the best reference continues to be Louis Holtz, Donat et la tradition de l'enseignement grammatical. Étude sur l'Ars Donati et sa diffusion (IVe–IXe siècle) et édition critique (Paris: 1981; repr. 2010), esp. 254–61 for the relationship between Isidore and the Roman teacher. An interesting presentation of Donatus and his later influence can be read in Federica Ciccolella, Donati Graeci: Learning Greek in the Renaissance (Leiden: 2008), 1–73.

partes orationis (nomen, pronomen, verbum, participium, adverbium, coniunctio, praepositio, interiectio), and the defects and adornments in the use of language (vitia et virtutes orationis). Nevertheless, Isidore lays out his contents in an order different from Donatus's original, which was the one circulating in Visigothic Hispania. In this new order we find at the beginning the partes orationis, generally congruent with the model of the Ars minor from the Roman grammarian. Following this section were the equivalent parts to the aforementioned books from the Ars maior, but in the order 1, 3, 2. This results in a circular structure in which the word categories, as main elements, open and close the grammatical teachings, first at a basic level and lastly with a more specialized approach. An organizational variant of this model, also typical of Visigothic schools, is the one that Isidore employs. It consists in avoiding duplication in two different places the teachings about the partes orationis and in compiling this entire chapter at the beginning. As a result, we obtain the following sequence: 2, 1, 3. The content of the Ars minor can then be subsumed in the part corresponding to book 2 of the Ars maior, or, as in the Etymologiae, can be completely eliminated.[6]

Isidore still introduces some other variants in this last structure and omits a short chapter, De voce, which is the heading of the Ars maior. Servius and Pompeius, commentators on Donatus's works who were well known within Visigothic-era schools, had already eliminated that chapter, and so it disappeared from the Visigothic grammatical tradition. In a context in which grammar is almost exclusively focused on the good command of the written language, the short reference to an aspect related to oral language becomes unnecessary. Isidore introduces another variant: placing the chapter on letters at the beginning of his manual on grammar,[7] even before the definition of the term grammatica. His reasons for this modification are as follows: the teaching of letters and numbers corresponds to the named ludorum magister and thus constitutes the first academic stage, prior to that of the grammaticus.

[6] See Louis Holtz, "Le De grammatica des Étymologies d'Isidore de Séville, structure générale et traitement des sources," in IV Congresso Internacional de Latim Medieval Hispânico, eds. Aires A. Nascimento and Paulo F. Alberto (Lisbon: 2006), 55–68, and José Carracedo Fraga, "De gramáticas y gramáticos en la Hispania visigótica," in Wisigothica. After M.C. Díaz y Díaz, eds. Carmen Codoñer and Paulo Farmhouse Alberto (Florence: 2014), 69–71.

[7] There are actually two chapters (1.3–4) dedicated respectively to litterae communes (the term is defined and it pertains to the first alphabets) and specifically to Latin letters. At the beginning of the corresponding part of book 1 of the Ars maior some codices of the Etymologiae include a very brief paragraph entitled De litteris apud grammaticos and in which the aforementioned definition of the term is repeated (1.3.3); that brief chapter (1.15) seems to have been added later to re-establish the order of the contents by Donatus.

Moreover, Isidore completes the basic grammatical program as defined by Donatus's manuals and includes several other complements which he considers important within the sphere of grammar. At the end of the section corresponding to book 1 of the Ars maior he adds two supplements: some brief chapters (1.21–26) about graphic signs, and a thorough chapter on orthography (1.27). The first ones are a complement to the chapter on punctuation, useful and practical for scribes and readers. The second one meets the need to clearly stipulate the orthographical norms of a written language which was becoming more dissimilar to spoken language. This need had led to the creation of monographic manuals on orthography since the 2nd century A.D., including that of Cassiodorus, a model for Isidore.[8]

The chapter on orthography lends itself to the introduction of other important additions to the text before addressing the contents of book 3 of the Ars maior, before the discussion of the mistakes that should be avoided in proper language and the adornments that can render such language more eloquent and effective. The review of letters and graphical problems allows the Sevillian bishop to call attention to one of his main concerns: vocabulary. A great portion of the elements cited in this chapter on orthography has to do with words which are phonetically similar and can only be distinguished if they are learned and written with the correct spelling. Isidore then introduces four "grammatical categories" taught since antiquity at the school of the grammaticus and which he clearly associates with vocabulary: analogia (1.28), etymologia (1.29), glossa (1.30), differentia (1.31). The main purpose of these complementary categories is the varietas ("variety") and the proprietas ("propriety") in the acquisition and command of lexis; in other words, the knowledge and usage of a vast and varied vocabulary, taking into consideration each word and its specific meaning. Having the ability to be able to select the words and arrange them with precision to express thoughts would allow the utterer to communicate with the accuracy and elegance that the grammarian aims to teach.[9] [8] Cassiodorus prioritized orthography in his grammatical teachings (Institutiones 2.1.2) and also wrote his own manual De orthographia, which was one of the direct models for Isidore and his main source for the chapter on orthography: at least 25 passages refer back to Cassiodorus's manual; see Patricia Stoppacci, Casiodoro. De orthographia (Florence: 2010), CLXXVII–CLXXX. Isidore had a great repertoire of manuals on orthography, which he also utilized for that specific chapter and for a number of his writings, especially for the Differentiae: Scaurus, (Ps.-)Caper, Agroetius, Velius Longus.

[9] The analysis of these four categories, which became the model, is taken from Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique, 38–48. If we leave aside analogy, a grammatical category considered more general and complementary to the other ones, it seems as if Isidore presents the other three grammatical categories in the order of greater to lesser importance and complexity, and in reverse sequence, as we will see, to the chronological order

The analogia ("analogy") is a systematization principle in ancient grammar based on the similarity between elements, in the knowledge of an element from its similarities to another known element. Isidore mainly associates analogy with the precise identification of vocabulary. The etymologia ("etymology") allows us to know the exact meaning of a word on the basis of its origin and its natural association with what the word denotes. The glossa ("gloss") refers to the explanation of a word through another having the same or an analogous meaning; it is therefore directly linked to analogy and synonymy. The differentia ("difference") is the specific element distinguishing a word from another very similar in meaning and form. Isidore uses these four grammatical categories as a methodological basis for research and literary creation. Not only do they appear with great frequency in Isidore's writings, but they also serve as a specific outline providing the title to some of his works, as we have stated with regards to the Etymologiae and we will analyse in more detail later in the case of the Differentiae and the Synonyma.[10]

To close this first book dedicated to the study of grammar in the Etymologiae, Isidore adds other chapters that differ from the structure of Donatus's technical manuals: De prosa (1.38), De metris (1.39), De fabula (1.40), De historia (1.41–44). His aim is to complete the grammatical curriculum with a brief introduction to the literary genres, first establishing a difference between poetry and prose and then between the genres of fiction and history. These chapters probably constitute a way to introduce, in a theoretical manual, a practical task and a very important component of the grammarian's teachings: the enarratio auctorum, or the analysis of those texts deemed exemplary due to their good use of language.[11] of the composition of the works to which they lend their names (of course, that is if we understand glossa as a form of synonymy).

[10] What Jacques Fontaine calls "the Isidorian grammatical triptyche" is found in Isidore de Séville et la culture classique, 36–55, and in Isidore de Séville. Genèse et originalité de la culture hispanique au temps des Wisigoths (Turnhout: 2000), 167–82. For a more detailed analysis of the etymologia (also in relation to other three categories) and the work to which it lends its name, refer to the chapter by Jacques Elfassi in this volume.

[11] Isidore pays special attention to the chapter on metre, especially as a complement to the preceding chapter on metrical feet (1.17), in order to provide a comprehensive treatment of the elements of prosody and metrics, which were objects of great interest in Visigothic schools; see José Carracedo Fraga, "Poesía y poetas en la escuela visigótica," in Poesía latina medieval (siglos V–XV). Actas del IV Congreso del Internationales Mittellateinerkomitee, eds. Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz and José M. Díaz de Bustamante (Florence: 2005), 93–107; Carracedo Fraga, "De gramáticas y gramáticos," 76–77 and 83–85; Paulo F. Alberto, "Poesía visigótica y escuela carolingia," in Latinidad medieval hispánica, ed. Juan F. Mesa Sanz (Florence: 2017), 27–53.

We are not aware of a specific model that could have served as a reference in Isidore's complete grammatical curriculum presented in his Etymologiae. It is evident that Isidore inherited a grammatical tradition that had transformed Donatus's manuals into basic models, but he had also seen the need to complement the outline with other content deemed important for grammatical training. As we have seen, Cassiodorus is an example of this Donatus auctus, since he includes orthography and etymology among the fundamental elements of grammar. At the beginning of an Ars grammatica, copied under the name of Sergius in the codex Lat. 2 (s. VII/VIII) at the Biblioteca Nazionale of Naples, one can read this most complete presentation similar to the program that Isidore proposes (fol. 55r-v):[12] "Grammar is the teaching of a correct language. It includes the following contents: letters, syllables, accents, feet, the eight parts of speech, anomalies, defects, figures, clauses, metres, etymology, orthography, explanation of historians and poets." It is evident that Isidore is also introducing his personal experience, his syllabus as a student and a teacher at the school in Seville.

An important aspect to consider is the process of Christianization at the school of the grammarian. It had been taking place since late antiquity within the Christian West, especially in the north of Africa, and it enjoyed great growth in Visigothic Hispania.[13] The grammatical teachings are mainly aimed at the service of Christianity. The clergy must possess a well-rounded education in order to properly understand and interpret Scripture as well as effectively carry out their pastoral duties. Isidore, therefore, understands and promotes the combination between secular and Christian culture as two necessary complementary elements. Perhaps what is most noteworthy is Isidore's pursuit of equilibrium among the two, which entails respect and an explicit awareness of all the good that a classical tradition can bestow. One can clearly observe this, for instance, in the chapters devoted to the vitia et virtutes orationis in the first book of the Etymologiae (32–37). We know that Isidore had at his disposal a specific Christianized treatise which included, for each element covered, numerous examples from both classical and Christian authors and from the Bible.[14] However, in his brief presentation Isidore offers, almost always (only on four occasions does he include a citation from the Bible), an example from a classical work, preferably the one included by Donatus himself.

Haec his rebus continetur: litteris, syllabis, accentibus, pedibus, VIII partibus orationis, anomalis, vitiis, figuris, clausulis, metris, etymologia, orthographia, expositione historicorum et poetarum." The text is transcribed in the Grammatici Latini, 7, 537–38. Remember also that in the fifth book of the Ars grammatica by Charisius there is a chapter on De differentiis, another on Glossulae multifariae idem significantes, and another on Synonyma (ed. Karl Barwick [Leipzig: 1925], 386–403, 408–12, and 412–49, respectively), although Charisius's authorship is not certain.

3 The Differentiae

Three treatises on differentiae were attributed to Isidore and under his name circulated in medieval codices. These are known as, respectively, Inter caelum/Inter aptum, Inter Deum, and Inter polliceri.[15] If we agree, however, with Braulio of Zaragoza's statement in his Renotatio librorum Domini Isidori ("he published two books of Differentiae"), it is almost certain that Isidore was the author of only two of these treatises.[16] For this reason, it is highly likely that Isidore did not write the Inter polliceri, as it exhibits many differences in comparison with the other two works, and especially because of the fact that he does not use a single Patristic source.[17] The specific attribution in the majority of the pre-9th-century manuscripts transmitting the works and the citations of subsequent authors assure Isidore's authorship of the Inter Deum. The Isidorian authorship of the Inter caelum is also confirmed by older manuscript transmission as well as coincidences between the prologue and presentation of this work in the aforementioned Renotatio, written by Braulio.[18] [14] See Carracedo Fraga, "Cristianización del capítulo," 28–36.

[15] From now on I will use the term Inter caelum to refer to the first of the treatises, as inter caelum et aethera is the first theme in this treatise according to the original thematic order. A subsequent alphabetical version led to the change to first place of the inter aptum et utile and, given that this version was edited in the Patrologia Latina, 83, 9–70, Inter aptum became the usual way to allude to the brief treatise before its most recent edition. On the relationship between the three treatises see: María Adelaida Andrés Sanz, "Relación y transmisión manuscrita de los tres libros de Differentiae editados en PL 83 (Isidoro de Sevilla)," Revue d'Histoire des Textes 30 (2000), 239–62.

[17] The editor of the Inter polliceri has already tried to clearly demonstrate that this treatise could not have been written by Isidore: Myra L. Uhlfelder, De proprietate sermonum vel rerum (Rome: 1954).

[18] On Isidore's authorship of the Inter Deum see the recent edition by María Adelaida Andrés Sanz, Isidori episcopi Hispalensis Liber differentiarum [II], CCSL 111A (Turnhout: 2006), 13*–16*. On the authorship of the Inter caelum see Carmen Codoñer, "La conception

Braulio associates, under the same title, the two Isidorian texts by addressing their common characteristics. As a result, the first editors of Isidore's Differentiae presented the Inter caelum and the Inter Deum as books 1 and 2. This is precisely what we find, for instance, in Juan Grial's edition (Madrid: 1599) and in the more recent edition by Faustino Arévalo (Rome: 1802) that becomes vulgata thanks to its reprinting in the Patrologia Latina.[19] However, despite the common elements that might lead us to see the two texts as complementary, there are a number of elements which lead us to believe that Isidore conceived these two texts as separate entities. The prologue at the beginning of the Inter caelum serves exclusively as presentation of this text, as it does not reflect the character of the Inter Deum, nor does it refer in any way to this portion of the text. The contents, the structure of each chapter and the work as a whole, as well as the objectives, are different in each text. We also find that the manuscript transmission is not the same: from the more than 120 known handwritten copies of the Inter Deum and the 24 of the Inter caelum, only 13 transmit both texts, and not always next to each other.[20]

We do not know which treatise Isidore wrote first, if at any point he had the intention of considering both texts as parts of the same work, or if he produced some manuscript with both texts copied together. What we can agree on with certainty is that the two brief treatises came about during Isidore's first creative period and that their composition should be situated around the year 600.[21] The more grammatical and scholarly character of the Inter caelum (with greater attention given to the method of its composition) as opposed to the highly doctrinal and elaborate Inter Deum, and the inclusion of a specific prologue in the first one (in which both intention and method were explained) and not in the second,[22] lead us to speculate that the Inter caelum came first.

[19] The same occurs in the editio princeps by Marguerin de la Bigne (Paris: 1580) and in the editions by Jacques du Breul (Paris: 1601 and Cologne: 1617), although here the Inter polliceri substitutes for the Inter caelum.

[20] In this way, for instance, the most ancient codex that contains both texts, Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, lat. 2994A (s. IX), transmits the first one in fols 73v–133v and the second in fols 141r–186v. In the common manuscript tradition, the first book is sometimes the Inter caelum and others the Inter Deum. See María Adelaida Andrés Sanz, "Isidorus Hispalensis ep., De differentiis libri duo," in La trasmissione dei testi latini del Medioevo. Mediaeval Latin Texts and their Transmission, vol. 2, eds. Paolo Chiesa and Lucia Castaldi (Florence: 2005), 307–22.

Just as Isidore himself defines it in the prologue to the Inter caelum[23] and in the corresponding chapter of the Etymologiae mentioned above (1.31), the differentia is the grammatical procedure seeking to explain with precision what distinguishes two words or expressions that are similar in meaning or form. It is therefore a lexicographical method which has as its objective the correction and the proper use of vocabulary, thus eliminating possible ambiguities and confusion between synonymous or homonymous terms. The usual outline contains the following elements: the introductory syntagma inter X et Y (sometimes another unit is added), sometimes a verbal structure that means "to differentiate" (ita distinguitur, sic discernitur, hoc distare solet, hoc interest, etc.), the definition tackling the specific characteristics of each term.[24]

We do not know of an earlier manual independently dedicated to the differentia which could have served Isidore as an immediate model. We know that, since antiquity, the differentia was included in manuals of rhetoric as a useful mechanism for the formulation of arguments. It was possible to see it appear sporadically in other works as a creative locus, also in grammatical texts. Examples can be found in grammars since the time of Varro (116–27 B.C.), although they abound especially from the 4th century A.D.[25] Isidore himself declares in the prologue of the Inter caelum that his main purpose was to compile the differences found among his readings, without denying personal authorship in some cases: "For the first time Cato wrote on differentiae among the Roman people; following his example I composed some differentiae and extracted other ones from auctores' works and compiled them to delight you, the reader."[26] Perhaps we should ascribe to Isidore a leading role both in considering the differentia an integral part of grammatical instruction and in having originality in elaborating specific autonomous manuals.

[22] The lack of a specific prologue in the Inter Deum resulted in the incorporation of another prologue known as Nonnulli norunt in a branch of the textual tradition; this probably took place in the 12th century; see María Adelaida Andrés Sanz, "El prólogo Nonnulli norunt en copias tardías del Liber differentiarum [II]," in 'Munus quaesitum meritis'. Homenaje a Carmen Codoñer, eds. Gregorio Hinojo Andrés and José Carlos Fernández Corte (Salamanca: 2006), 61–69.

[23] Isidore expressly points out that the value of each word comes mainly from its origo, in other words, through its "etymology"; by this method he establishes a relationship between the differentia and the etymologia. On the relationship between the two grammatical categories and the works they inspired in Isidore, see Carmen Codoñer, "Differentia y etymologia, dos modos de aproximación a la realidad," in De Tertullien aux Mozarabes. Mélanges offerts à Jacques Fontaine, eds. Louis Holtz and Jean-Claude Fredouille, vol. 2 (Paris: 1992), 19–30.

[24] A detailed analysis of the formal outlines of the Inter caelum can be seen in Isabel Velázquez, Latine dicitur, vulgo vocant. Aspectos de la lengua escrita y hablada en las obras gramaticales de Isidoro de Sevilla (Logroño: 2003), 96–100 (119–25 for the Inter Deum), and Andrés Sanz, Isidori episcopi Hispalensis Liber differentiarum [II], 30*–41*.

[25] Among the vast bibliography on the history of the genre of the differentia, refer to Carmen Codoñer, "Les plus anciennes compilations de Differentiae: formation et évolution d'un genre littéraire grammatical," Revue de Philologie 59 (1985), 201–19; Adriana della Casa, "Le

The sources Isidore employed to compose his Inter caelum are mainly grammatical works written by some of the authors of late antiquity.[27] The most abundant coincidences (approximately a hundred or so entries) are with Servius's commentaries on the poems of Virgil. Some variations, noteworthy because of their similarities in many cases with the text from the so-called Servius auctus, suggest that Isidore also utilized Aelius Donatus's commentaries on Virgil, which have been lost (there are also several coincidences with the commentaries of Donatus on the comedies of Terence). A great number of entries (56 and 19, respectively) present literal or almost literal correlations with passages from the treatises De orthographia by Agroetius and (Ps.-)Caper. There are also many parallelisms (in some 20 entries) with the work De compendiosa doctrina written by the African grammarian Nonius Marcellus, especially with his fifth book dedicated precisely to De differentiis similium significationum, but the discrepancies in some citations and parts of the definition allow us to speculate that there was a common model rather than direct use of Nonius's work. Nor can we establish with certainty a direct use of Charisius's grammatical treatise because of the coincidences in 20 or so entries.[28] It is more certain that the writings of Christian authors were utilized, given that Isidore states that it is necessary to draw from both Pagan and Christian authors, even in a work that is eminently grammatical. These authors are mainly Jerome (15 parallelisms) and Augustine (around 40 parallelisms).[29] It is worth noting that Isidore transcribes Jerome word for word, whereas he very seldom copies directly from the work of Augustine; he elaborates and adapts the text of the bishop of Hippo, as if indicating a greater familiarity with and assimilation of the works. The Bible also influences the work necessarily, and its use becomes more evident and direct in 11 entries.

[27] On the sources of the Inter caelum, see the specific chapter in Codoñer, Isidorus Hispalensis. De differentiis I, 27–42; there is also more information in the explanatory notes on each entry, 302–412. Some specific examples are offered by Magallón García, La tradición gramatical, 239–44, and Jacques Elfassi, "Quelques sources non repérées du premier livre des Différences et des Étymologies d'Isidore de Séville, ou comment deux œuvres s'éclairent mutuellement," Voces 22 (2011), 25–38.

[28] Within a vast production of grammatical texts, it is often difficult to establish concrete dependencies and intermediaries; it is these which probably have produced the coincidences and parallelisms we find here with other grammatical authors, such as Varro, Quintilianus, Aulus Gellius, Probus, Marius Victorinus, and Placidus.

Another important aspect is the direct citations used as explanatory examples. Almost all these citations are taken from classical authors: Afranius (4 citations), Ennius (1), Horace (1), Juvenal (1), Livy (1), Lucilius (1), Pacuvius (2), Plautus (3), Sallustius (4), Terence (3), and, above all, Cicero (12) and Virgil (18). Only 3 citations are taken from these Christian authors: Augustine, Jerome, and Tertullian. It is almost certain that the classical citations derive from intermediary sources, whereas the Christian ones were taken directly by Isidore himself. It is evident that even here Isidore wished to complement classical and Christian conventions, but his respect for the classical tradition is especially manifest in his grammatical work.

In the aforementioned edition by Arévalo (Rome: 1802) the Inter caelum featured 610 entries in alphabetical order from the Inter aptum et utile. The most recent editor of the text has demonstrated[30] that there were only 482 entries originally and that these were organized in thematic groups in which the criterion for the type of word (nouns, adjectives, pronouns, verbs, adverbs, prepositions, conjunctions, interjections) or the criterion for formative elements of words (prefixes or suffixes) is taken into account. It is natural that a work with such a practical and open character be subjected, from the very beginning, to new additions of entries as well as to the process of alphabetization.

[29] The works by Augustine which were probably utilized are: De animae quantitate, De civitate Dei, De doctrina christiana, De Genesi ad litteram, De libero arbitrio, De musica, De ordine, De Trinitate, De vera religione, Epistulae, Enarrationes in Psalmos, Sermones, Soliloquia. The works by Jerome are: Epistulae, In Danielem, In epistulam ad Ephesios, In epistulam ad Galatas, In epistulam ad Titum, In Matthaeum. There are also some coincidences with the works by Hilarius, Cassiodorus, and Gregory the Great.

[30] Carmen Codoñer, "Historia del texto del libro I de las Differentiae de Isidoro de Sevilla," Revue d'Histoire des Textes 14 (1984), 77–79. A classification of the entries by semantic values can be seen in Magallón García, La tradición gramatical, 247–60; Velázquez, Latine dicitur, 69–95, offers an analysis of the different procedures Isidore utilized to establish the differences and organize the different entries.

The Inter Deum, often known as book 2 of De differentiis, is briefer than the previous text, and the most recent edition is organized into only 41 chapters. These chapters are not structured as homogenously as the entries of the Inter caelum because, as we have mentioned, the content and objectives are clearly different. In the Inter Deum Isidore also utilizes the composite procedure of the genre of differentia, formerly explained, to introduce and structure the contents. However, now the main interest is not exclusively grammatical, nor is it the metalinguistic reflection on similar terms that must be clearly distinguished; the main interest is inherent in the referential content, in the detailed explanation of the referents behind the terms serving as an introduction to each theme. Beneath a formal frame, typical of grammatical differences, there is an anthropological and theological reflection on God and the Trinity, on the creation of the world and the creatures that inhabit it, and on humans in all their different aspects. The differences between the two treatises are reflected in the names attributed to them by the tradition: the title De differentiis verborum ("On the differences between words") was already given to the Inter caelum in a number of the medieval manuscripts; the Inter Deum has received names related to its doctrinal content, such as Differentiae de divinitate ("Differences on the divinity"), Differentiae spiritales ("Spiritual differences"), Differentiae theologicae ("Theological differences"), or the more widespread title in modern times for having been utilized in the aforementioned edition by Arévalo (Rome: 1802), Differentiae rerum ("Differences of things").

The sources of the Inter Deum are almost exclusively Patristic.[31] Augustine continues to be the most cited author in the work. The Moralia in Job by Gregory the Great also leaves an important imprint. Other authors serve as support for the composition of some chapters: Lactancius, Gregory of Elvira, Gaudentius, Jerome, Cassian, and Fulgentius.[32] Of course, the Scriptures are more evident here: there are 44 citations or direct allusions referring back to 20 different books from the biblical text. Nevertheless, there are also sporadic uses of classical texts (probably also through intermediaries) by Ennius (1 citation) and Cicero (3). In this more theological treatise Isidore wishes to record his scholarly character and continue to play with the combination between what is Christian and what is pagan.

[32] Besides the Moralia, the texts that most influenced the Inter Deum are: De civitate Dei, Confessiones, De consensu Evangelistarum, De Genesi ad litteram, De ordine, and De Trinitate by Augustine; Divinae institutiones and De opificio Dei by Lactantius; De fide by Gregory of Elvira; Tractatus by Gaudentius; Contra Iohannem, In epistulam ad Ephesios, and In epistulam ad Galatas of Jerome; Conlationes by Cassian; and De veritate praedistinationis, Epistulae, and De Trinitate by Fulgentius.

The Inter Deum was also subject to manipulation after Isidore. Still on Iberian soil and early on, some brief complementary phrases were added and words were changed; yet the linguistic characteristics suggest that Isidore was not responsible. Some copies of this revised text were found in the south of Gallia and in Northern Italy, and in the latter it was subjected to further, more significant, modifications: the alterations of some paragraphs, the elimination of others, and, above all, the addition of some new ones inspired by other works by Isidore, such as the Sententiae or the Etymologiae, or taken from the same sources that Isidore himself utilized.[33] The branch of transmission within which these major alterations were done, whose common antecedent is denoted by the editor as ψ, is the one transmitting both treatises on De differentiis by Isidore together, and is also responsible for some of the most important modifications in the Inter caelum.

The more theological, doctrinal, and even more encyclopaedic character of the Inter Deum fostered a greater dissemination of this work. As we have already mentioned, we know more than 120 manuscripts maintaining this brief treatise, of which 40 were written before the 11th century. Of the Inter caelum, however, we know of 24 codices, and only 5 of these codices were compiled before the 11th century. This last treatise circulated as a scholarly work of reference mainly associated with—besides other Isidorian writings—grammatical texts, primarily dealing with lexicon; it attracted special attention in Renaissance Italy, where scholars were very interested in the genre of the Differentiae. The testimonies of the Inter caelum that remain allow us to define two main textual families:[34] one (known as φ) is situated in Gaul and organized by themes; another (referred to as χ) transmits the version in alphabetical order with a greater number of additions and derives from Italy or the south of France. This last family coincides in part, as I have already mentioned, with the branch ψ of the tradition of the Inter Deum.

We can establish four other main branches for the Inter Deum (γ, ζ, λ, ρ), which transmit a text without the more extensive additions typical of the family ψ. Branch γ must be situated in central and northern France; branch ρ originates in some location in Switzerland connected to the British Isles; family λ is composed of offshoots disseminated throughout all Europe, but located above all in Switzerland and around Lyon; family ζ is clearly related to Irish and Anglo-Saxon centres, both in the British Isles and on the continent.[35] The citations of the work testify to an important circulation within Visigothic and Mozarabic Hispania; we find quotations in the Apologeticum fidei (*c.*686) by Julian of Toledo. Citations from it are also found in the acta of the Fifteenth Council of Toledo (a. 688), the Epistula episcoporum Hispaniae (*c.*792) by Elipandus of Toledo, the Epistulae (5.9.4) by Albarus of Cordoba (*c.*800-*c.*863), and the text also known as Apologeticum fidei (*c.*880) by Samson of Cordoba. In all these texts the Inter Deum is employed as a dogmatic authority. This interest was, indubitably, a priority throughout the whole history of its dissemination, but all the more so during the late Middle Ages.[36] For this reason the Inter Deum circulated with doctrinal and exegetical texts, mainly of Trinitarian content. However, its hybrid character is also evident during the most ancient phase of its reception, and for this reason, in the codices dating before the 12th century the treatise appears connected with relative regularity with other grammatical and lexicographical texts.

4 The Synonyma

Isidore utilizes yet another grammatical procedure and presentation to create his Synonyma, as the author himself declares in the introduction of the work (1.3):[37] "Recently a booklet called Synonyma came to my hands; its form persuaded my mind to compose a lament for myself or for wretched people." It is evident that Isidore has within his reach and uses as a source of inspiration some text in which there were lists of synonymic phrases. These types of texts were used and prepared in the grammar and rhetorical schools of late antiquity in order to train students in copia and varietas verborum, in other words, in the richness and elegance of the vocabulary necessary for an appropriate and elegant use of language. Catalogues compiling simple lists of synonyms (as in the style of the Synonyma Ciceronis), or more complete treatises in which synonymy is presented in more complex syntactical structures (phrases or sentences) were useful resources both in grammar and rhetorical schools and enjoyed great popularity and dissemination during late antiquity and early Middle Ages.[38] Isidore's main model is, without a doubt, some brief treatise of this second sort, but we do not know which one it could have been. We have the Glossulae multifariae idem significantes, which are included in the fifth book of the Ars grammatica by Charisius, and we know, through the Collectaneum miscellaneum by Sedulius Scottus, that there exists a catalogue entitled Glossa consentanea. Both texts present similarities with Isidore's work, but perhaps we should rather think about similar outlines whose common antecedents or relationships cannot be defined precisely at this time.[39]

[35] It is also probable that there was an early dissemination of the Inter caelum throughout the British Isles, which would explain its influence on some of the biblical commentaries of the school of Canterbury at the time of Theodore and Adrian (see Michael Lapidge, The Anglo-Saxon Library [Oxford: 2006], 177), or its use by the grammarian Malsachanus (see Bengt Löfstedt, Der Hibernolateinische Grammatiker Malsachanus [Uppsala: 1965], 50–51 and 250). Furthermore, Isidore follows a model of grammatical and rhetorical exercises which through syntactical structures of similar meaning (playing with parallelisms or variations) facilitate the study of synonyms and antonyms, the different word classes, types of verb complements and structures, and types of sentences.[40] Nevertheless, behind this grammatical form we also find the main objective, which is to create a single spiritual and moral treatise. The work is organized in two books that differ both in content and tone. In the first one, more lyrical, man as sinner laments his suffering, and reason invites him to sincerely examine his conscience and repent of his faults. In the second book, more normative, reason offers the necessary guidelines for that man who has repented and is willing to live a virtuous life. Isidore already refers to this content in the aforementioned prologue to the work,[41] and copyists of manuscripts highlight it by adding explanatory subtitles, such as De virtutibus, vitiis et moribus ("On virtues, vices, and good conduct"), Formula honestae vitae ("Rules for a noble life"), De miseria humanae conditionis ("On the misery of the human condition"), De contemptu mundi ("On contempt for the world"), De lamentatione animae peccatricis ("On the lamentations of the sinner's soul"), etc.[42]

[38] Isidore associates synonymy with the school for grammarians, when in book 1 of the Etymologiae he addresses the nomina synonyma (1.7.14) or, as it has been said, he includes among the grammatical categories the glossa (1.30), understood as a play on synonyms. Yet he also recognizes the importance and continuity of synonymy in the rhetor's school, as he explains it as part of rhetorical figures (Etymologiae 2.21.6).

[40] An analysis of the formal procedures is found in Velázquez, Latine dicitur, 129–34.

[41] I am referring to the original prologue by Isidore (1.3–4, Elfassi, Isidori Hispalensis episcopi Synonyma). Another prologue (1.1–2, Elfassi, Isidori Hispalensis episcopi Synonyma),

These complements to the title do not appear, however, in the oldest manuscript tradition and cannot be attributed to Isidore. The only two titles documented in the oldest codices are Synonyma and Liber soliloquiorum. The first, which is the one we use to refer to the work nowadays, was offered by the family of textual transmission Λ. It is without question the original title, as Isidore himself utilizes it in his correspondence with Braulio of Zaragoza (Epistula B). Braulio also uses it in his Renotatio, and it also appears in the De viris illustribus by Ildefonsus of Toledo. The second title is offered by family Φ, and it is justified because the text is constructed as a personal reflection of a man sustaining an internal dialogue with reason, and it is probable that it can also be attributed to Isidore.[43]

The Patristic sources are, indeed, the most widely used in the Synonyma, and the reference authors are the same ones we have already seen with the two books of the Differentiae. The Moralia in Job by Gregory the Great is the most utilized work. Many loan words are taken, above all in the second book, from Ambrose of Milan's De officiis. We have evidence of the use of other authors in specific chapters: Cyprian (Ad Donatum, De bono patientiae, De lapsis, De zelo et livore, Epistulae), Lactantius (Divinae institutiones), Cassian (Collationes), Arnobius the Younger (Ad Gregoriam), Cassiodorus (Expositio Psalmorum), and Leander of Seville (De institutione virginum). Jerome and Augustine are present which was clearly not written by Isidore, was added during the 8th century (it was probably written outside the Iberian Peninsula and is exclusively associated with manuscript family Φ); its author wanted to highlight Isidore's authorship and offer a complete summary of the moral and ascetic content of the two books.

[42] The last subtitle appears in the codex El Escorial, Real Biblioteca del Monasterio de San Lorenzo, f.IV.8 (s. XV), which was utilized, among other manuscripts, by Juan de Mariana in the edition of Juan Grial (Madrid: 1599). This subtitle was subsequently employed by Faustino Arévalo in his edition (Rome: 1802); this edition became the referent in modern times thanks to its reprinting in the PL (83, 825–68).

[43] Isidore includes soliloquy besides synonymy in the rhetorical devices, as the translation of the Greek term peusis (Etymologiae 2.21.47). Although there is no evidence that Isidore had read and used the Soliloquia by Augustine with the same intensity as other works by the bishop of Hippo, and although the content and the style of the Augustinian treatise and those of Isidore are very different, the coincidence in the title and dialogic style between man and reason does not seem arbitrary. Jacobus de Gruytrode, in his incunable edition (Antwerp: 1487), wanted to highlight in the title the dialogical form of the text: Dyalogus sive Synonima Ysidori de homine et ratione.

throughout the entire text.[44] The Bible is cited frequently: in the first book the texts of Job and the prophet Jeremiah stand out, corresponding to the first part's lyricism and tone of lamentation; in the second book the wisdom texts predominate, coinciding with its normative and gnomic tone. In both books we find numerous citations of the Psalms, very appropriate, again, for a normative, lyrical, synonymic, and repetitive style.

We have already established that Isidore probably had available some manual of synonymic exercises similar to that known as the Glossa consentanea. To this source we probably owe all or almost all citations of classical authors that we find in the Synonyma conferring on the text its character of an academic treatise within the classical tradition. Naturally, the most employed work is the Tusculanae Disputationes by Cicero (14 citations). There are also citations from Cicero's De oratore and from the Paradoxa Stoicorum, as well as from the Breviarium of Eutropius, the Carmina of Horace, the Saturae of Juvenal, fragments of the poet Marcius, the Epigrammata of Martial, the Metamorphoses of Ovid, the Bacchides and the Captivi of Plautus, the Institutio oratoria of Quintilian, the Adelphoe, the Andria and the Phormio of Terence, and Virgil's Aeneid.

The two aforementioned families of textual transmission correspond with two different stages of composition. Besides the different titles, numerous and very significant textual variants allow us to appreciate clearly that we are dealing with deliberate and independent corrections in several parts of the text. The harmony among the style and sources of specific passages of each composition indicates that both versions belong to the same author, Isidore. The hypothesis brought forward by the treatise's editor to explain this singularity is very coherent and convincing:[45] between the years 619 and 631 Isidore sent [44] Other works by Gregory the Great are: Homiliae in Ezechielem and Regula pastoralis. From Ambrose there are also: De Cain et Abel, De Iacob et vita beata, De Nabuthae, and Hexameron. There are several works by Jerome: Contra Iohannem, Epistulae, In Amos, In epistulam ad Galatas, In Ezechielem, In Ionam, In Matthaeum, and mainly In Ecclesiasten. The works by Augustine are numerous: Confessiones, Contra mendacium, Contra Priscillanistas et Origenistas, De baptismo, De continentia, De excidio urbis Romae, De moribus, De quantitate animae, De sermone Domini in monte, De Trinitate, Enarrationes in Psalmos, Enchiridion, Epistulae, and Sermones. A brief presentation of the sources is found in Elfassi, Isidori Hispalensis episcopi Synonyma, XVI–XXII.

[45] See Elfassi, Isidori Hispalensis episcopi Synonyma, LVIII–LXV and CVIII–CXIII. The hypothesis had already been presented by Jacques Elfassi, "Isidorus Hispalensis ep., Synonyma," in La trasmissione dei testi latini del Medioevo. Mediaeval Latin Texts and their Transmission, vol. 1, eds. Paolo Chiesa and Lucia Castaldi (Florence: 2004), 218–26, and also in "Les deux recensions des Synonyma," in L'édition critique des œuvres d'Isidore de Séville. Les recensions multiples, eds. María Adelaida Andrés Sanz, Jacques Elfassi, and José Carlos Martín (Paris: 2008), 153–84. On another possible interpretation see Jacques Elfassi, "Une Braulio, at this point archdeacon in Zaragoza, a copy of the Synonyma, whose first draft had been in preparation since 610.[46] The copy that Braulio received or another related copy led to the origin of the family Λ, whose earliest dissemination is documented in the British Isles and in centres on the continent related to the Insular mission.[47] Isidore reproduced, based on the first rough copy (perhaps because he was left without a copy of the text he sent to Zaragoza), a second version, which is preserved in family Φ, disseminated in earlier times mainly within France.

The novel combination of a useful and ascetic spiritual guide with a didactic grammatical form later termed stilus Isidorianus ("Isidorian style") transformed the Synonyma into a highly successful work throughout the Middle Ages. There are more than 500 complete manuscripts and more than 80 codices with important extracts from the work dating before the year 1400; some 40 of these copies date to the 7th, 8th, and 9th centuries. Let us add to this list the existence of translations into old English and old French, each one preserved in two medieval codices, and above all, some centos based on the Synonyma that were produced between the 10th and 14th centuries and which were disseminated independently, especially in the 14th and 15th centuries. Among these centos it is worth mentioning: the Collectum preserved in at least 145 manuscripts, the De norma vivendi preserved in at least 84 manuscripts, the Monita preserved in at least 40 codices, and the Tractatus deflentis hominis et ammonentis rationis preserved in at least 38 codices.[48] nouvelle hypothèse sur les deux recensions des Synonyma d'Isidore de Séville: quelques remarques critiques," Archivum Latinitatis Medii Aevi 69 (2011), 197–201.

[46] I use the dates proposed by José Antonio de Aldama, "Indicaciones sobre la cronología de las obras de S. Isidoro," in Miscellanea Isidoriana. Homenaje a S. Isidoro de Sevilla en el XIII centenario de su muerte (Rome: 1936), 66–67. In any case, it is not possible to determine with precision the date at which the Synonyma was written, as the only precise piece of information we do have tells us it was created after the year 595, the date at which the Moralia in Job by Gregory the Great arrived in Seville. On the date of the work and the arguments that can be employed see Martín, Scripta de uita Isidori, 231–33, and Elfassi, Isidori Hispalensis episcopi Synonyma, XI–XVI.

[47] On the dissemination of the Synonyma in the British Isles we cannot leave out the work by Claudia Di Sciacca, Finding the Right Words: Isidore's Synonyma in Anglo-Saxon England (Toronto: 2008), which at 16–36 includes a brief presentation on the structure, the style, and the sources of this treatise. See also Claudia Di Sciacca, "Isidore of Seville in Anglo-Saxon England. The Synonyma as a Source of Felix's Vita S. Gutlaci," in Isidore of Seville and his Reception in the Early Middle Ages. Transmitting and Transforming Knowledge, eds. Andrew Fear and Jamie Wood (Amsterdam: 2016), 131–57, and the chapter by Martin J. Ryan in this volume.

[48] On the subsequent popularity of the Synonyma, see, besides the works by Di Sciacca previously cited, some of the writings by Jacques Elfassi: "Isidorus Hispalensis ep., Synonyma,"

Although later authors who imitated the Synonyma prove that this work served as a model of grammatical teaching and, above all, exercises in style, and for this reason was utilized in grammar schools throughout medieval Europe,[49] its manuscript transmission and reception suggest that the work was seen mainly as a moral and ascetic text in the Middle Ages, as Isidore had probably designed it.[50] The great majority of manuscripts transmitting the work include it with other texts of theological and doctrinal content, especially ascetic, moral, and dogmatic treatises. It is also significant that in codices incorporating other elements of the Isidorian corpus, the Synonyma are generally associated with the Sententiae and the Inter Deum (the second book of the Differentiae). Very seldom do the Synonyma accompany any other grammatical text. The most representative example is the third part of a codex in Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Reg. Lat. 310 (s. IX$^{\text{in}}$): beside the Synonyma we find the glossary Abavus, the Inter polliceri, the Inter Deum, and the dictionary or lexical catalogue which is book 10 of the Etymologiae.

5 Conclusion

Isidore wished to present a complete education in all branches of learning to his intended audience, as is shown by his wide and varied writings, above all the Etymologiae. Grammar formed the indispensable foundation of this education, as a sound understanding of language was the only path, as he saw it, to any further area of study. Above all, therefore, Isidore wrote as a grammaticus and, as we have seen, presents in the first book of the Etymologiae a detailed resumé of necessary grammatical learning. This programme is linked to the tradition associated with Aelius Donatus, which had become the principal model for schools in late antiquity and the high Middle Ages. To it were added other elements which were of especial concern to schools in Visigothic Iberia: orthography, metre, and, above all, the acquisition of a large vocabulary. This particular focus on commanding a knowledge of a wide variety of words and their precise meanings is what led Isidore to pay special attention to lexical differences, synonyms, and etymology, and writing specific works focussed on these topics. As a result, his Differentiae, Synonyma, and Etymologiae, while having dogmatic, technical, or academic content, are also thesauri of vocabulary, guides to writing, and therefore works of grammar. It is thanks to these works that Isidore came to be regarded as the master of grammar in the centuries following his death and that his works frequently circulated in medieval codices as parts of compilations dealing with grammar.

[50] It is true that in the prologue Isidore insists mainly on this moral and ascetic content, but it is also true that he wished to utilize a title for his work that could highlight its grammatical structure. A classic work on this aspect is the one by Jacques Fontaine, “Isidore de Séville auteur ‘ascetique’: les énigmes des Synonyma,” Studi Medievali 6 (1965), 163–95. This work is complemented by Jacques Elfassi, “Les Synonyma d’Isidore de Séville: un manuel de grammaire ou de morale? La réception médiévale de l’œuvre,” Revue d’Études Augustiniennes et Patristiques 52 (2006), 167–98.

CHAPTER 9

Isidore of Seville and the Etymologies

Jacques Elfassi

1 Introduction

The Etymologies are considered Isidore's masterwork: his longest work, the one that, as far as we know, most occupied the bishop until his death; the one that, along with the Sententiae and the Synonyma, was the most appreciated in the Middle Ages; the one that has been the most studied in our time; the one responsible for Isidore's recent designation as Patron Saint of the Internet. And yet, much about the Etymologies remains unknown, although, as we shall see, great strides have been made in the past few years. Furthermore, recent research has also invited new questions. For example, we are no longer sure today that Isidore divided his encyclopedia into twenty books, nor even that some of these books were part of the project as conceived by its author. While covering the basic facts, it seemed to me important to touch on these new hypotheses and even to suggest a few paths for new research. This chapter is intended less as a declaration of the current "state of the question" than as a declaration of research in progress.

2 The Genesis of the Work

The surviving documents shedding light on the genesis of the Etymologies fall into two groups: the first consists of the oldest manuscripts; the second includes Isidore's correspondence and Braulio of Zaragoza's Renotatio.[1] Because these sources are often very difficult to interpret, they have given rise to many more hypotheses than certainties. The major facts conveyed by the oldest manuscripts are as follows:[2] first of all, certain witnesses contain a dedication to King Sisebut (612–21); furthermore, in certain manuscripts, the first ten books (in the modern division into books) are divided into three books and there is a notable correlation between the copies that show signs of this division into three books and those dedicated to Sisebut. In all cases, in this first grouping of ten books, three (of the modern division into books) are problematic. Book 4 is missing from some manuscripts or appears in the second part of the Etymologies. Book 5 is sometimes in two parts (De legibus and De temporibus), and its final section (the chronicle in chapter 39) contains major variants. Some manuscripts contain only the second prologue of book 10. Although it involves going beyond the evidence of the manuscript tradition, it can also be noted that the contents of chapter 5.39 and of book 10 seem to confirm their heterogeneous character: chapter 5.39 is an abbreviated form of Isidore's Chronicle, and book 10 is a kind of dictionary which is the only part of the Etymologies to be classified alphabetically. Carmen Codoñer suggested that Etym. 5.39 might contain the marks of a smaller independent work later inserted into the Etymologies.[3] The same can be said for book 10.[4] Finally, we should mention that several rather long passages (for example, 1.34–37 and 2.21.3–48) are found in only a few manuscripts, which might indicate intentional reworkings (by Isidore or others).

[2] Not only is the account below a mere sketch, but the reader should recall that extant manuscripts all bear some signs of contamination. For a discussion in greater depth, see the classic

Isidore's correspondence with Braulio of Zaragoza is a source of other kinds of information. In letter II, dated after 631,[5] Braulio asks Isidore for a copy of the Etymologies, which he has heard has been completed. In letter IV, sent to Isidore in 632–33, Braulio writes that there is already an incomplete version of the Etymologies circulating among many people, and he reminds Isidore that he had already asked him for a copy of the work seven years ago (that is to say, around 625–26). In letter V, from the same period, Isidore replies, sending a copy of his work and explaining that, due to ill health, he has not been able to correct any errors, and asking that his friend do so.

[4] See Carmen Codoñer, Introducción al Libro X de las "Etymologiae": su lugar dentro de esta obra, su valor como diccionario (Logroño: 2002), 46.

[5] For the numbering and dating of Braulio's letters to Isidore, I follow the conclusions of Ruth Miguel Franco, "Introducción," in Braulionis Caesaraugustani Epistulae et Isidori Hispalensis Epistulae ad Braulionem, ed. Ruth Miguel Franco (with the collaboration of José Carlos Martín), CCSL 114B (Turnhout: 2018), 9*–56*.

In his Renotatio librorum domini Isidori, Braulio explains that he has divided the Etymologies into books (libri), whereas Isidore had arranged them in "titles" (tituli). It is quite probable that the "titles" Braulio speaks of do not correspond to the present chapters, but it is not easy to know how these subdivisions were organized and whether such divisions may be reflected in the manuscripts.[6] However, the text of the Renotatio presents an even greater problem because it is unclear whether Braulio divided the encyclopedia into fifteen or twenty books. The oldest manuscripts of the Renotatio all speak of fifteen books, suggesting that the archetype of the manuscript tradition of the Renotatio had the number "fifteen." However, most experts believe that this fifteen should be corrected to twenty (that "xx" might turn into "xv" is easy to imagine), since the Etymologies are generally divided into twenty books.[7] Veronika von Büren has noted that the oldest manuscripts of the Etymologies in which the text is divided into twenty books (that is, where the division was not added later), are no earlier than the 9th century.[8] In other words, the division into twenty books is perhaps not as old as has often been thought. One problem that von Büren has not solved is that there is no known early copy in which the Etymologies are divided into fifteen books. She suggests that the fifteenth book's organization is present in those manuscripts that divide the first ten books into three parts and combine books 11 and 12 into one. Her view is that there were three books corresponding to the present books 1–3, 5–6, and 7–9; the present book 4 (de medicina), which was separate from these three units; the sections De astronomia of book 3 and De temporibus of book 5, which were each considered separate books; a book corresponding to the present books 11 and 12; and finally, eight books corresponding to each of books 13–20.[9]

[6] The only scholar to have studied this question has changed her mind: Carmen Codoñer, "Los tituli en las Etymologiae. Aportaciones al estudio de la transmisión del texto," in Actas. I Congreso Nacional de Latín Medieval (León, 1–4 Diciembre de 1993), ed. Maurilio Pérez González (León: 1995), 29–46; and, more recently, her Introducción al Libro X, 20–25.

[7] This was the opinion of the scholar responsible for a critical edition of the Renotatio: José Carlos Martín, Scripta de uita Isidori Hispalensis episcopi, CCSL 113B (Turnhout: 2006), 167–68. However, Martín thinks now that "xv" is not only the reading of the archetype, but also, probably, of the author: see José Carlos Martín, Escritos medievales en honor del obispo Isidoro de Sevilla, Corpus Christianorum in Translation 29 (Turnhout: 2017), 85.

[8] Veronika von Büren, "La place du manuscrit Ambr. L 99 sup. dans la transmission des Étymologies d'Isidore de Séville," in Nuove ricerche su codici in scrittura latina dell'Ambrosiana. Atti del Convegno (Milano, 6–7 ottobre 2005), eds. Mirella Ferrari and Marco Navoni (Milan: 2007), 35–36.

Nevertheless, the case von Büren makes is not entirely convincing because the elements important in her view (uniting books 1–3, or separating the section De astronomia from book 3) are in fact attested in certain manuscripts, but there is no copy that includes all of these elements.

According to Marc Reydellet, "Braulio's division into twenty books is an incontrovertible truth."[10] On the other hand, von Büren believes that she has "demonstrated" the original division into fifteen books.[11] Given the current state of our knowledge, such peremptory affirmations should be avoided. The evidence of the oldest manuscripts of the Renotatio in favor of fifteen cannot be ignored, but neither can the ease with which "xv" can be mistaken for "xx," nor the fact that there is no extant manuscript of the Etymologies in fifteen books.

I have spent a lot of time on the problem of the division into fifteen or twenty books in order to show, by means of a specific example, how contradictory the documentation at our disposal can be, and how difficult it is to interpret. Reconstituting the phases of the construction of the Etymologies remains an extremely hypothetical undertaking. Let us nonetheless attempt a sketch of the history of the oldest text of the Etymologies.[12]

The earliest version is that dedicated to Sisebut, necessarily earlier than 621. We do not know what this "Sisebutian" version was like, but it may have included only the first nine books as we have them, divided into three parts: the liberal arts (present books 1–3), human law and divine law (book 5, perhaps without chapter 39, and book 6), and names of God and of the people (books 7–9). Book 10 was perhaps included as a kind of appendix.

Isidore, then, finished, revised, and rewrote that first version. This process of revision was probably progressive and relatively continuous in the 620s and at the beginning of the 630s. Around 633, he sent Braulio a version that he must have considered nearly definitive, although he advised that it still should be revised. We can identify some obvious signs of the unfinished state of the Etymologies, like empty or missing lemmas[13] or insertions in the manuscript announcing a biblical citation not in fact provided.[14] The repetitions that occur throughout the work are perhaps also reflections of its incomplete state, but it is difficult to be sure of this, since the Etymologies are an encyclopedia rather than a text to be read from start to finish, so such repetitions are not necessarily troubling.[15] In any case, it is impossible to know what the Etymologies would have looked like if Isidore had been able to complete them himself.

At Isidore's death in 636, the posthumous history of the Etymologies begins, and it too is not clear. Braulio tells us that the division into books was his own work, but did he also add other major corrections? The praise of Zaragoza in 15.1.66 has sometimes been attributed to him,[16] but nothing proves that it is his addition.[17] In any case, the most important problem is whether the "vulgate" version as we have it today corresponds to Braulio's version. That is the most widespread belief, but von Büren proposed new hypotheses. She suggests that the "vulgate" version we use today actually dates from the Carolingian period and was the result of the work of Theodulf of Orleans and his circle as they were elaborating the Liber glossarum.[18] According to her, only in the Carolingian period were the Etymologies, which Braulio had divided into fifteen books, arranged into twenty books; and only then were certain chapters added (e.g. chapters 1.34–37 and 2.21.3–48, two passages concerning rhetorical figures). Such conclusions have the merit of questioning well-established traditions, although more research is needed to develop such insights.[19]

(Zaragoza: 1996), 275, notes that the number of empty or missing entries increases in the last three books.

[19] For example, it is hard to see where T (Madrid BN Vitr. 14.3) belongs in von Büren's stemma. See also a critique of von Büren's theory in Anne Grondeux, "Note sur la présence de l'Hypomnesticon pseudo-augustinien dans le Liber glossarum," Dossiers d'HEL 8 (2015), 71–74. Grondeux also proposes a very interesting hypothesis which, if it is verified, could shed new light on the genesis of the Etymologiae: according to her, the Liber glossarum could keep track of some preparatory dossiers of Isidore's encyclopedia.

3 Structure and Contents

It is customary, whatever the nature of the work being analysed, to examine its structure. When the work in question is an encyclopedia, such a study is indispensable. This is not the place to attempt yet again to define the encyclopedia as a genre, but we can agree that it contains at least three characteristics: multidisciplinarity; exhaustivity (or at least the aim of being exhaustive); and systematic organization of knowledge.[20] Multidisciplinarity and the aim of exhaustivity are characteristics of the Etymologies stressed by Braulio in his Renotatio: "Overflowing with eloquence of various arts (diuersarum artium) with regard to nearly every point of them that ought to be known (quaecumque fere scire debentur)."[21] But encyclopedias aspire not merely to collect as broad a body of information as possible, they also seek to organize it. This leaves researchers the task of attempting to understand the logic, the worldview, behind this immense work.

In most medieval manuscripts, and in modern editions, the Etymologies are divided into twenty books. Of course, as the preceding section showed, this division is not necessarily to be attributed to Isidore himself, and it is not even clear that it can be traced to his first "editor," Braulio of Zaragoza. Nevertheless, the overall scheme, the division of subjects discussed and their order (the choice, for example of beginning with a book on grammar), can certainly be attributed to Isidore. From the historical point of view, it is an undeniable fact that almost all Isidore's readers have become acquainted with the work in the form in which we have it today, in twenty books. The contents of these twenty books are as follows: I grammar, II rhetoric, III mathematics, music, and astronomy, IV medicine, V law and chronology, VI Holy Writ and Church services, VII God, angels, and saints, VIII the Church and heresies, IX languages and social groups, X an alphabetical list of nouns and adjectives describing human nature and activities, XI humans and monsters, XII animals, XIII the world and its parts, XIV the earth, XV cities, XVI stones and metals, XVII agriculture, XVIII war and games, XIX ships, buildings, and clothing, XX food, drink, and utensils.

It is possible, starting from this basic structure, to perceive a kind of superstructure explaining the overarching organization of the Etymologies. The most frequent current scheme of analysis involves dividing the work into two parts: books 1–10 and books 11–20.[22] Two arguments are offered to justify this division. The first is historical: it is plausible, as we have seen earlier, that a first version of the Etymologies consisted only of the first ten books. The oldest manuscript tradition marks a clear break between the first ten books, whose division and order are very variable in the manuscript tradition, and the last ten, where the composition is much more stable.[23] Furthermore, several old manuscripts retain the marks of a separation between these two groupings. For example, the manuscript Madrid BN Vitr. 14.3 (T), copied at the end of the 8th century, separates book 10 from book 11 with the words Item pars secunda.[24] The second argument is connected to the content of the two groupings. It is often agreed that books 1–10 are more intellectual and spiritual than books 11–20, which are more concerned with material reality. "The first half of the Etymologies focuses on the spiritual and intellectual aspects of man. […] In the second half of the Etymologies the general subject is man in his material dimensions, and his environment."[25] [20] The bibliography of encyclopedias as a genre is immense. Because it brings together contributions from a great variety of sources, I will mention here only the work of Jason König and Greg Woolf, eds., Encyclopaedism from Antiquity to the Renaissance (Cambridge: 2013), especially the contribution of Andrew H. Merrills, "Isidore's Etymologies: On Words and Things," 301–24.

And yet, this division into two parts does not seem obvious to me. One might ask if this was not influenced, unconsciously, by the Oxford edition of Lindsay, which breaks the work into two volumes in just this way.[26] But as its editor said explicitly, "The division of the whole work into 'pars I' (= Books 1–10) and 'pars II' (= Books 11–20) was a mere matter of convenience."[27]

---

[22] The most common division is into two parts in this way, but it is an overstatement to declare, as does Carmen Codoñer, "De l'Antiquité au Moyen Âge: Isidore de Séville," in L'encyclopédisme. Actes du Colloque de Caen, 12–16 janvier 1987, ed. Annie Becq (Paris: 1991), 31, that this division is generally accepted by all.

[23] This argument is proposed, notably by Carmen Codoñer, "La enciclopedia. Un género sin definición. Siglos I a. C.–VII d. C.," in Giornate Filologiche Genovesi. L'enciclopedismo dall'Antichità al Rinascimento (Genoa: 2012), 152–53.

The whole of the work was too long to fit into a single volume, so the break between books 10 and 11 made it possible to publish two volumes of about equal size, each containing the same number of books. The same solution was applied in the bilingual edition (Latin and Spanish) published in Madrid in 1982. Significantly, the reprint of this edition in 2004 appeared as a single volume.[28]

Among the arguments in favor of dividing the work into two parts, the historical one is apparently the strongest, since it has an objective basis: it is not the interpretation of modern readers but the evidence of the oldest manuscripts, going back, perhaps, as far as Isidore himself. However, it seems to me that two different points of view are being conflated here: the diachronic point of view (the history of the composition of the Etymologies) and the synchronic (the analysis of the completed work). It is not necessary to conclude that because, at a given moment in the first stage of their composition, the Etymologies (may have) consisted only of their present first ten books, those books should be dissociated from the ten that follow (in the final version). It would be better to reverse the reasoning: if Isidore chose to add to his first version (hypothetically limited to the first ten books), it was because he considered it incomplete. It would then be paradoxical to continue to dissociate the parts that the author sought to bring together. It is probably not an accident, for example, that the second part begins with a book devoted to the parts of the human body (book 11), because this allows the creation of a link between books 9, 10, and 11, all three devoted to humans: human institutions in book 9, human properties in book 10, and human anatomy in book 11. The contrast between a first part about intellectual training of man and a second part devoted to describing material reality also should be nuanced. For example, book 9 discusses geographical questions that are quite close to those of books 13, 14, and 15.[29] In what way is it more "intellectual" or "spiritual"? It too describes the visible world. Conversely, seemingly very materialistic books like books 15 or 20 also have a theological background and theological aims.[30]

More than a century ago, another bipartite structure was proposed by Ernest Brehaut.[31] According to him, the first eight books constitute an "encyclopedia of education," that is, a textbook of liberal arts and religion, inspired by Martianus Capella and Cassiodorus; books 9–20 form an "encyclopedia of all knowledge," in the tradition of Varro or Pliny the Elder. Time has not been kind to Brehaut's book which is rarely cited by Isidore experts today. Still, that his division into two big units is not absurd is suggested by the fact that it was echoed by Codoñer. According to her, the first part of the Etymologies is a kind of textbook of liberal arts, to which Isidore added other subjects, like medicine, law, and history, creating a "kind of textbook intended exclusively for clerics." Only after this does the "encyclopedia proper begin, the description of everything known about the material world, the visible."[32] Codoñer retains and even defends the traditional bipartite division into two parts of ten books each (1–10 and 11–20), but it seems to me that her analysis is closer to the organization proposed by E. Brehaut. The textbook of liberal arts corresponds to books 1–3, the Isidorian addition (medicine, law, and history) to books 4–5, and the "textbook intended for clerics" to books 6–8. The "encyclopedia proper," the description of the visible world, begins with book 9.

Codoñer herself also suggested another two-part model that seems to me to account for the evidence even more effectively: books 1–5 provide the "techniques" allowing knowledge to be acquired, whereas books 6–20 provide things to know.[33] In the end, it is J. Fontaine, working with this model, who offered the best interpretation of the structure of the Etymologies. He identified four broad sections: books 1–5 (preparation for a range of learning); 6–8 (religion); 9–14 (man, animate nature, and the universe); and 15–20 (material culture).[34] But Fontaine marks the first five books clearly as preparation for the knowledge set forth in the remaining books. Fontaine's essential contribution comes from his dynamic interpretation of books 6–20, arranged in a descending hierarchy: Isidore starts with God (books 6–8), goes on to man (books 9–11), to animals (book 12), inanimate nature (books 13–17), and finally to man-made objects (books 18–20). The order is not static, organized by the juxtaposition of distinct thematic blocks, but proceeds. rather according to a dynamic of the whole, where each book is connected to the others.

The art of connections can be seen especially in the care that Isidore takes with transitions, setting up connecting bridges. This is visible at the start of pivotal books, or those that can seem transitional: book 6, which presents the descendent dynamic of the Etymologies, and book 9, where the description of the visible world begins. Book 6 ("Books and ecclesiastical offices") is naturally connected to book 5 ("Laws and time"). From certain angles, they have the same contents, both juridical and chronological, with the distinction that book 5 is mostly profane, while book 6 focuses on conciliar canons and the liturgical year.[35] Those two books can therefore be understood as a sort of diptych describing the practical instruments required for civil and religious life.[36] As for book 9, depicting the civic dimensions of human society, it logically follows book 8, which presents human society from a Christian point of view. This is in keeping with Augustine's model where man has a place in both the city of God and the city of man.[37] Chapter titles (which may be a reflection of Isidore's tituli)[38] stress the continuity between the two books: the last chapter of book 8 (Chapter 11) is titled De diis gentium (the gods of nations), and the first chapter of book 9 is De linguis gentium (the tongues of nations).[39]

"The generally descending hierarchy of facts" and "overlap of the various elements in a constructed whole" in book 15 can be applied to understanding the whole of the Etymologies.[40] The movement of the whole and the ability to organize the various books is what, beyond the widespread use of etymologies, helps make the encyclopedia coherent.

Isidore drew inspiration from many sources, he borrowed from many kinds of works, but he was able to bring these different genres together into a relatively coherent whole. For example, the first three books are often treated as a unit, and indeed they are a textbook of liberal arts, but their organization and conception are not especially different from that of the other books of the Etymologies. Analysing the chapters devoted to arithmetic and geometry in book 3, Jean-Yves Guillaumin showed how Isidore gave them a distinctly personal slant.[41] For example, in the field of geometry, he omits a number of passages found in his model, Cassiodorus, replacing them with land-surveying and etymological considerations. Even when he describes the liberal arts, his final aim is practical (geometry is a means of measuring land), and his approach is above all taxonomic and etymological.

There are, of course, some passages that seem to preserve their independence, like 5.39, which belongs to a quite specific literary genre, the chronicle, or book 10, quite distinct from the other books by its alphabetical arrangement (if in fact this is attributable to Isidore himself).[42] However, even 5.39 is well integrated into book 5 and the body of the Etymologies as a whole.[43] Book 10 has an obvious link to the other books: the words there are almost all defined in terms of etymology, the procedure that gives the work as a whole its title. Moreover, its place, between book 9 (on human society) and book 11 (devoted to human anatomy), can be explained if we recall that it describes human qualities.

To claim that the Etymologies form a totally homogeneous whole would be excessive, but taken together, it presents a logical structure with a degree of coherence. Given the multiplicity of sources on which the work is based and the mass of information that the Etymologies contains, its coherence is one of the most notable aspects of the work.

4 Etymology

Isidore uses four grammatical categories to explain words: analogy (analogia), gloss (glossa), differentiation (differentia), and etymology (etymologia).[44] These function, to use Jacques Fontaine's words, like "categories of understanding." According to Isidore's definition, "analogy, that is, similarity" (analogia, id est similitudo), is the "comparison of similar things" (similium conparatio).[45]

[42] It is possible that the alphabetical order of book 10 of the Etymologiae was not Isidore's creation, Carmen Codoñer, "El libro x de las Etymologiae, ¿léxico o diccionario?" Voces 21 (2010), 50. But, as Codoñer is careful to point out, nothing can be proven, especially because all extant manuscripts transmit the book in alphabetical order.

[45] Isidore, Etymologiae 1.28.1–2.

For example, “the leaves of books are so called from their likeness (ex similitudine) to the leaves of trees” (Etym. 6.14.6). Metaphorical appellations based on resemblance are sometimes included among the various categories of etymologies found in Isidore’s work,[46] although the author himself does not include them in his list of the different kinds of etymology (Etym. 1.29.3–4). Instead, he treats similitudo as a form of analogy, not an etymology. From the morphological point of view, an etymological relationship almost always implies that there are two words in relation to one another, one of which is derived from the other. On the other hand, naming something metaphorically does not create a new word, but rather a pre-existing term acquires a new sense. Furthermore, the common characteristics of the two do not appear in the word itself. For example, a sheet of paper (folia) is like the leaf of a tree (folium) because both are thin, delicate; but this quality does not appear in the noun folia, and that is why Isidore does not consider it useful to make this relationship explicit. One is not derived from the other; they are the same word with different meanings, and therefore in such cases etymology is not involved.[47]

A gloss defines a word by means of another word.[48] As J. Fontaine remarks, in practice, a gloss is often used to provide a simple synonym to explain a Latin word that might be difficult, or a Greek word,[49] for example, “Gnarus, ‘knowing’” (Etym. 10.112), or “Katholicus, ‘universal,’ a Greek term” (Etym. 10.153). According to Isidore, the gloss “defines the utterance in question by means of one single word” (uno et singulari uerbo). In reality, the term offered as a gloss is often further defined by one or several other words. For example, in the expression, Subulcus, porcorum pastor (Etym. 10.263), pastor (“herdsman”) is offered as a gloss for subulcus (“swine-herd”), but pastor itself requires the addition of porcorum (“of pigs”); only then is the sense of subulcus clear. The limits of gloss can be extended to include more complex definitions, like populus:

> Populus est humanae multitudinis coetus iuris consensu et concordi communione sociatus

[46] See Olga Spevak, “Isidore de Séville: le livre XIV des Etymologiae et la tradition étymologique,” Revue des Études Latines 87 (2009), 236.

[47] Actually, Isidore’s distinction between analogia/similitudo and etymologia is not always perfectly clear. In this example, folia and folium are a little different, at least synchronically: folia is the plural of folium reinterpreted as a feminine singular. For a stricter use of analogia, see Etymologiae 12.6.4–6, where Isidore explains how some fishes were named “on a similarity (ex similitudine) to land animals.”

[48] Isidore, Etymologiae 1.30.1.

[49] Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique, 47.

> The populus is an assembly of a human multitude, allied by the sharing of law and by agreement as if of one mind (Etym. 9.4.5).[50]

Populus is first glossed by humanae multitudinis coetus ("an assembly of a human multitude"), followed by the characteristics of that "assembly." Isidore adds another detail to his discussion of populus:

> Populus autem eo distat a plebibus quod populus uniuersi ciues sunt, connumeratis senioribus ciuitatis. Plebs autem reliquum uulgus sine senioribus ciuitatis. Populus ergo tota ciuitas est. Vulgus uero plebs est.
> But the populus differs in this respect from the plebs, because all the citizens make up the populus, including the higher ranks of the citizen body. But the plebs is the remaining people apart from the higher ranks of the citizen body. So the populus is the entire citizen body, while the plebs is the common people (Etym. 9.4.5–6).

This brings to bear a third "category of understanding": differentiation, which allows distinctions to be made between two words, which are close in sense or in pronunciation, and are therefore often confused.[51]

In any case, analogy, gloss, and differentiation are not used very frequently in the Etymologies, in which the principal category is etymology. The fact that Isidore chose to give his encyclopedia the title Etymologies is proof of its importance. In some editions (notably Wallace Martin Lindsay's) the work has another title: Origines. But Etymologiae is the only one attested in the manuscript tradition and in the catalogues of medieval libraries, and also the one used by Braulio in the Renotatio. It is true that Braulio's letter IV mentions the "books of Origines" (libri … Originum), but this is the only—very indirect—evidence for Origines over Etymologiae. Basing his remarks primarily on this passage, Fontaine conjectured that perhaps Isidore chose Origines as a first title before finally adopting Etymologiae.[52] But this hypothesis does not undermine the testimony of the entire manuscript tradition: the definitive title is Etymologiae.

The choice is significant. In dictionaries of modern languages, the Oxford English Dictionary, for example, etymology is treated as supplementary information, independent of the definition proper of a word. In contrast, in the Etymologies, not only is etymology included in the definition, but it is the very foundation of the definition. Isidore's concept of etymology has been the subject of many studies by both historians of the philosophy of language[53] and Latin philologists.[54] Attempting to understand the logic and the range of chapter 1.29, "On Etymology" (De etymologia), they applied themselves to distinguishing Isidore's use of etymologia and origo, and, beyond the Etymologies, they showed that Isidore's theory had roots in ancient grammatical thought. The quantity and quality of these studies permit me to be relatively brief here. We should recall that Isidore's own account is very succinct. The famous chapter 1.29 on etymology consists of only 225 words. This brevity is not surprising, because Latin writers did not devote many pages to etymological theory.[55] Moreover, Isidore is generally not especially expansive in explaining the theoretical assumptions that underlie his work. As we have seen, nowhere does he offer an explanation of the principles underpinning the organization of his encyclopedia. It should also be noted that although he wrote an entire work in a style dominated by synonyms, the Synonyma, he only devotes a paragraph to the definition of synonymy (Etym. 2.21.6). The very fact that he devotes a whole chapter to etymology is therefore significant. However, one cannot fail to be struck by the contrast between Isidore's short chapter and the large number of commentaries it has provoked recently.

These commentaries are probably caused by the bewilderment of modern readers when faced with Isidore's concept and widespread application of etymology, and, more generally, with the significance of this concept in ancient and medieval thought. Modern linguistics, following Ferdinand de Saussure, distinguishes the signifier of a word, that is, its form, its acoustic effect, from its signified, that is, the concept to which it is tied. The connection between the signifier and the signified is arbitrary, that is, unmotivated. There is no natural relation between a word and the concept associated with it. To put it another way, the relationship between a word and the concept it designates depends entirely on a convention accepted by the speakers. Saussure nuances this principle by adding that some words can by "relatively motivated," as is the case for compound or derived words. Another major contribution of Saussurian linguistics is the distinction between diachrony and synchrony. The diachronic study of a language seeks to understand its evolution over the course of its history, while a synchronic approach focuses on a single moment in the history of that language.

More recently, see Codoñer, "El libro X de las Etymologiae," 66, n. 23, with bibliography up to 2010. To these can be added Magallón García, La tradición gramatical, 261–368, and Bernard Ribémont, *Les origines des encyclopédies médiévales. [55] This point is noted by Françoise Desbordes, "La pratique étymologique des Latins et son rapport à l'histoire," in L'étymologie de l'Antiquité à la Renaissance, ed. Claude Buridant (Villeneuve-d'Ascq: 1998), 69.

In a very schematic way, which will be further examined below, Isidore's point of view is almost totally different from that of Saussure. For Isidore, there is usually a natural connection between a word and what it signifies. The word is not an arbitrary sign of the thing, but rather a reflection of its essence. Starting with the word, it is possible to drill down to its very essence. Of course, Isidore is aware that a word often has only an imperfect reflection of the thing, but this imperfect is like a hazy mirror that must be cleared up. Clarifying the mirror is all that is needed to gain access to reality,[56] and that is exactly the role of etymology.

> Etymologia est origo uocabulorum, cum uis uerbi uel nominis per interpretationem colligitur. [...] Cuius cognitio saepe usum necessarium habet in interpretatione sua. Nam dum uideris unde ortum est nomen, citius uim eius intellegis. Omnis enim rei inspectio etymologia cognita planior est.[57]

> Etymology (etymologia) is the origin (origo) of words, when the force of a verb or a noun[58] is inferred through interpretation. [...] The knowledge of a word's etymology often has an indispensable usefulness for interpreting the word, for when you have seen whence a word has originated, you understand its force more quickly. Indeed, one's insight into anything is clearer when its etymology is known (Etym. 1.29.1–2).

[56] The image of the hazy mirror can be found in Ribémont, Les origines, 44.

[57] Text from Lindsay's edition.

[58] An alternate reading would be "the force of a word or name" ("uis uerbi uel nominis"): see Amsler, Etymology, 139–40.

From the etymological experience of a word, its "force" can be seen, its essential meaning, leading to the connection between the word and the thing. By discovering the deep sense of a word in this way, the etymologist is not far from discovering the very essence of reality as it was conceived by God. Clearly—and this is an important detail—Isidore himself recognized that "some things received names not according to their innate qualities, but by the caprice of human will" (Etym. 1.29.3). This constitutes a major concession that explains why sometimes, as we have seen, recourse to a gloss, an analogy, or differentiation is required to explain certain words.

Nonetheless, this limit of etymology is almost never mentioned in the rest of the work. One of the few exceptions concerns the word quinque ("five"), which "did not take its name from nature, but rather from the arbitrary will" (Etym. 3.3.2). At the same time, it is worth noting that the source is not an undefined "arbitrary will," but rather "the arbitrary will of the one who bestowed the names." The intent of this periphrasis is not clear. It evokes the "legislator" of Plato's Cratylus (which Isidore may have known indirectly) or Adam at the start of Genesis (2:20), although the names given by Adam were in Hebrew,[59] or divine intervention in a more general sense.[60] In any case, what matters here is that when Isidore speaks of the arbitrary origin of certain words he does not mean, as modern linguists would, that there is an arbitrary convention among speakers of the same language; he assumes that their origin is super-human.

The notion of origin, which is at the very heart of the definition of etymology ("Etymology is the origin of words"), might give Isidore's etymologies a historic depth.[61] It is known that Isidore used the word origo in the title of one of his major historical works (the second version of the History of the Goths is titled De origine Gothorum, "On the Origin of the Goths"). He also used the word in the Etymologies (15.1.2), explicitly attaching it to a historical context: "histories" (historiae) bring us the "origin" (origo) of certain cities. Still, Isidore's etymology is not historical. It is neither diachronic nor synchronic; rather, it is achronic. It strives to present the "origin" of a word, but without giving its history. To the best of my knowledge, the definition of etymology has never been compared to another text of Isidore concerning the creation of the world (Sententiae 1.8.6). Yet this text is very interesting, since it shows clearly that origo should not automatically be understood in a temporal sense (origine non tempore):

> Materies, ex qua formatus est mundus, origine non tempore res a se factas praecessit.
> The matter from which the world was formed preceded the things made out of it in origin, not in time.[62]

This passage from the Sentences draws on Augustine's Confessions (12.29.40),[63] but Isidore reformulates it, making it more concise and striking: origine non tempore. He clarifies his analysis with a comparison taken from the same passage in the Confessions:

> ut sonus cantum. Prior enim est sonus cantu, quia suauitas cantilenae ad sonum uocis, non sonus pertinet ad suauitatem. Ac per hoc utrumque simul sunt, sed ille ad quem pertinet cantus prior est, id est sonus.
> in the same sense as sound precedes the song.[64] For sound is prior to the song, because the pleasantness of the song pertains to the sound of the voice; the sound does not pertain to the pleasantness. And because of this, both exist simultaneously (simul), although that to which the song pertains is prior, that is, the sound.

The origin is prior in logical terms, not chronologically. In other words, a thing is not necessarily earlier in time because it is implicated in the "origin" of another thing. The same is true for etymology: it is not because a word is implicated in the "origin" of another word that it is pre-existent; the connection between a word and its "origin" is atemporal.

Such a declaration requires nuancing, to be sure. Occasionally there is the shadow of a diachronic move to be found in Isidore's work. For example, in Etym. 15.4.11, the entry on "basilica" includes a real history of the word:

> Basilicae prius uocabantur regum habitacula, unde et nomen habent; nam basileus rex et basilicae regiae habitationes. Nunc autem ideo diuina templa basilicae nominantur, quia ibi regi omnium Deo cultus et sacrificia offeruntur.
> The dwellings of kings were called "basilicas" at first, whence they take their name, for the term basileus means "king," and basilicas, "royal habitations." But now "basilica" is the name for divine temples because there worship and sacrifices are offered to God, the king of all.

There is a clear opposition between "at first" (prius) and "now" (nunc), as well as between the imperfect tense used in the first sentence and the present tense in the second. But passages like this are rare. The near total absence of diachronic consideration is striking in the Etymologies, even in passages which might have—which by modern standards should have—led to such considerations. In Etym. 5.30.15, for example, the etymology of meridies ("noon") is in keeping with what is accepted today:[65]

> Meridies dicta quasi medidies, hoc est medius dies.
> Midday (meridies) is so called as if the word were medidies, that is, the "middle of the day" (medius dies).

However, the sentence is in the present tense, and quasi introduces the etymon "medidies" without in any way situating it in the past. In this case, etymology has no historical dimension. Another passage is even more significant, as it allows us to compare Isidore's practice to that of another ancient scholar. At issue is the definition of the word abstemius (Etym. 10.11):

> Abstemius, a temeto, id est uino, quasi abstinens a uino.
> Abstemious (abstemius), from temetum, that is, "wine," as if abstaining from wine.

Aulus Gellius (10.23.1) provides the same connection between abstemius and temetum:

> Mulieres Romae atque in Latio aetatem abstemias egisse, hoc est uino semper, quod 'temetum' prisca lingua appellabatur, abstinuisse.
> The women of Rome and Latium were lifelong abstemiae, that is abstainers from the use of wine, called temetum in the old language.

Here, Aulus Gellius furnishes a temporal specificity where Isidore does not.[66]

The passages cited above have illustrated the impossibility of separating etymological theory from its practice. In the case of meridies, for example, the etymon is introduced by quasi. Such a metalinguistic tool is significant, since quasi neutralizes the distinction between the cause and the origin of the word. It permits the etymon of a word to be presented from the point of view of its form at the same time that it explains its meaning.[67] Meridies dicta quasi medidies means both that "meridies is derived from medidies" and "meridies is so called because the word means the 'middle of the day.'"

However, philologists have only recently begun to focus on the formal procedures Isidore used in the Etymologies. Carmen Codoñer was the pioneer in this area, distinguishing four "basic formulas":[68] equivalence, indicated directly by means of one or several synonyms, a present participle, or a relative pronoun; the phrase ab + ablative; quasi, addressed above; and a causal subordinate clause starting with quod or quia. This typology was noted by other philologists who added other prepositions like ex, ob, pro or propter, or adverbs like inde and unde.[69] However, as Codoñer pointed out, these different types are often combined. They are discriminated here in the interests of clarity, but they engage the same conception of etymology—and the desire for variation should be kept in mind. Etymology is not represented by any particular syntactic structure. It requires only the presence of the origin which connects a word and its etymon phonologically, and the possibility of explaining that origin semantically.[70]

[66] It does not seem that Isidore knew Aulus Gellius directly. Despite the proximity of the two authors, in this case it is plausible that they are using a common source independently. See other parallels in Robert Maltby, A Lexicon of Ancient Latin Etymologies (Leeds.: 1991), 2 (s.v. "abstemius"). Modern linguistics affirms the link between temetum and abstemius: Ernout and Meillet, Dictionnaire étymologique, 679–80; De Vaan, Etymological Dictionary, 609.

Isidore frequently superimposes morphological and semantic layers, as we saw in the case of meridies above, since for him etymology is at once a matter of form and meaning. But for a contemporary reader, mixing these two levels is disturbing, and sometimes even results in what seems like nonsense to us. For example, in a sentence like Proci … a procando et petendo dicti (Etym. 9.7.7), procando is the etymological explanation of proci, but not petendo, which is a synonym of procando. Isidore means at once that "procus comes from procare" (proci … a procando) and that "suitors are so called because they seek and claim" (proci … a procando et petendo). But for a modern reader, procando and petendo are not related, and bringing them together seems an aberration.[71]

That sentence is a particularly striking illustration of one of the major difficulties of ancient etymology, especially as deployed by Isidore. In contemporary usage, the autonym (that is, the word focused on, which is the sign of itself) is typographically marked by quotation marks or italics, neither of which exists in Latin. The major problem is syntax: modern languages can mark the specificity of the autonym, separating it from normal rules of agreement. Isidore is aware of this possibility. For example, in the case of Nemo ab homine tractum, "Nobody (nemo), derived from 'human being' (homo)" (Etym. 10.184), tractum is neuter, that is, it does not agree with the subject, nemo, which is masculine. In the same way, in the case of Non … dicimus beneuolus, "We do not say beneuolus" (Etym. 10.26), beneuolus is nominative even though after dicere an accusative would be expected. But these examples are in fact exceptions; most of the time, Isidore does present the autonym in the expected case, gender, and number. For example, in the sentence cited above, Proci … a procando … dicti, petendo is in the ablative because the preposition a is followed by that case, and dicti is masculine plural, agreeing with the subject, proci. It would be interesting to follow Isidore's metalinguistic choices more closely, comparing them to other Latin etymologists. Isidore's etymological theory has thus been the object of considerable study, while its practical applications have so far been little examined.[72]

5 Sources

To compose his encyclopedia, Isidore took almost all his material from earlier sources, long earning him the unflattering reputation of being a compiler lacking originality. In 1959, Jacques Fontaine revolutionized Isidorian studies by showing, on the contrary, that Isidore's originality consisted precisely in his way of choosing and treating his sources.[73] Not only did Isidore adapt his sources in very diverse ways, ranging from directly copying a long passage to free adaptations, but he also mixed and intertwined them. Rather than try to make a list of all the methods used by Isidore, I would like to focus on three practices that he used in rewriting his sources and that are likely to strike the modern reader as particularly disconcerting: "auto-combination"; citations taken out of their frame of reference; and the use of synonyms.

The word "auto-combination" was invented by Manuel Cecilio Díaz y Díaz to describe the process of contaminating a text with another that is the source of the former.[74] So, chapter 7.6 of the Etymologies at once borrows from the Liber interpretationis hebraicorum nominum of Jerome and from the Instructiones of Eucherius of Lyon, who himself drew his information from Jerome. It is therefore not enough to settle on the most obvious source (Jerome) without considering the intermediate source (Eucherius) as well.[75]

Isidore has another surprising habit, that of taking a sentence from a work that is about something completely different. For example, the definition of the military formation called a cuneus is taken from Augustine's De ordine and about the Vascones from Jerome's Contra Vigilantium.[76] Sometimes, the sentence has no connection at all with its original context. To use Fontaine's expression, it may be totally removed from its original frame of reference ("décadrée").[77] For example, the definition of etymology in Etym. 1.29.2 uses a formulation found in Tertullian where it refers to something entirely different (the origin of persecution). Likewise, the definition of a hearth in Etym. 20.9.1[78] is taken directly from Servius, Aen. 6.265, where he explains Virgil's reference to the river Phlegethon.[79]

[79] I believe I am the first to note this source.

I would also like to consider another kind of rewriting that, to the best of my knowledge, has not yet been studied in the Etymologies: synonymous rewriting. For example, the portrait of Jerome in Etym. 7.1.1 is taken from Augustine (Ciu. Dei 18.43):[80]

> Presbyter Hieronymus, homo doctissimus et omnium trium linguarum peritus, qui… ex Hebraeo in Latinum eloquium easdem Scripturas conuerterit > Beatissimus Hieronymus, uir eruditissimus et multarum linguarum peritus, Hebraeorum nominum interpretationem primus in Latinam linguam conuertit.
> The most blessed Jerome, a most erudite man and skilled in many languages, first rendered the meaning of Hebrew names in the Latin language.

The synonymous rewriting can be observed for each group of words:

- presbyter Hieronymus > beatissimus Hieronymus
- homo doctissimus > uir eruditissimus
- et omnium trium linguarum peritus > et multarum linguarum peritus
- ex Hebraeo in Latinum eloquium easdem Scripturas conuerterit > Hebraeorum nominum interpretationem primus in Latinam linguam conuertit.

It is true that Isidore is referring here to Jerome's Liber interpretationis, while Augustine's subject was the Bible, but Isidore was under no obligation to change, for example, homo doctissimus into uir eruditissimus and in Latinum eloquium to in Latinam linguam. Isidore is much more faithful to the same passage in Augustine in Etym. 6.4.5.[81] Here, he rewrote almost the entirety of Augustine's text using a stylistic mode he was particularly fond of, the synonymous style that he used in his Synonyma. Another even more striking example concerns the invention of pottery in Samos. Pliny the Elder's Natural History (35.152) is rewritten:

> In Samo primos omnium plasticen inuenisse … tradant is totally rewritten as

> Tradition has it that clay vases were first invented on this island (Etym. 14.6.31).[82]
> – in Samo > in hac insula
> – inuenisse > reperta
> – primos > prius
> – plasticen > fictilia uasa
> – tradant > traduntur

In this case, the borrowing from Pliny is probable, as Isidore uses the same section of Pliny, more literally, in Etym. 20.3.3[83] (it is also possible that in Etym. 14 Isidore did no more than rewrite his own text from Etym. 20). In any case, Pliny seems to be the only writer likely to be known by Isidore to mention the invention of pottery at Samos. But clearly, without the parallel of Etym. 20.3.3 and without any knowledge of the antique traditions about the invention of pottery, the identification of the source would have been very difficult.

Isidore does not usually cite his sources. He incorporates extracts into his text proper without any indication of their origin. When he does introduce them by stating the name of the author explicitly, or even the title of the work he is excerpting, that generally indicates that he is citing them from an intermediate source.[84] This usage, which seems paradoxical to moderns, does have a few exceptions. For example, the fact that Isidore includes Ambrose's name when he cites De fide in Etym. 11.3.35 does not mean that he was not acquainted with this text. In Etym. 7.1.14 and Etym. 8.5.70, he uses it without mentioning Ambrose; it is not possible to draw any conclusion whatsoever from the difference between the two practices.[85]

This illustrates the difficulty of distinguishing primary and secondary sources. For example, there is near unanimity that Isidore did not know Terence, Horace, or Juvenal except by means of excerpts in grammatical works or in commentaries. On the other hand, his direct acquaintance with Virgil, Quintilian, and Martial is, if not certain, at least probable.[86] Among profane authors, those most used by Isidore are "technical" authors: grammarians, like Diomedes, Pompeius, or Sergius; historians, like Eutropius, Florus, Justin, or Rufius Festus; doctors, like Caelius Aurelianus, Dioscorides (known in two separate Latin translations), Gargilius Martialis, or Vindicianus;[87] agronomists, like Columella and Palladius; or experts on architecture, like Faventinus. The five profane authors he uses most often are, in order of increasing use: Placidus; Festus; Pliny the Elder; Solinus; and Servius.[88] But Isidore makes much more use of Christian authors, especially Ambrose, Jerome, Gregory the Great, and Augustine (again listed in order of increasing use). José Carlos Martín has published a very useful list of the Patristic works that Isidore knew,[89] yet much detailed analysis remains to be done.[90]

Many other sources of the Etymologies are still to be discovered. The edition of the Etymologies presently being prepared in Paris in the collection "Auteurs Latins du Moyen Âge" has profited from electronic data banks, which since the 1990s have greatly facilitated the search for sources.[91] However, it should not be forgotten that this undertaking is still incomplete (books 1, 4, 8, and 10 have not yet appeared[92]). Even these recent editions are sometimes imperfect.[93] Moreover, the search for sources is unending. In a review of the edition of book 14, I was able to add thirty-seven sources the editor had missed.[94] Later I found a thirty-eighth, indicated in a second review.[95] I thought that I covered them all, but since then I have found five or perhaps six others:

It is not implausible that others remain to be discovered.

Recent work has identified not only a large number of sources but also texts that previously scholars had no idea that Isidore might have known, like Augustine's Contra Secundinum and his Sermon 4, sources for books 5 and 7 of the Etymologies.[99] I have also just discovered that Etym. 10.240 borrows from Basil's Rule, as translated by Rufinus (cap. 110, resp. 1–3, CSEL 86, p. 137 l. 3–9)—the first known sign of this text in Visigothic Spain.[100] It is worth repeating: there are still many sources to be found.

6 Medieval Reception

This will be a short section, for three reasons. The first is that this Companion already has several chapters concerning Isidore's medieval reception, including that of the Etymologies.[101] Moreover, Carmen Cardelle de Hartmann has published an article on this subject which provides an état présent of knowledge about this question and outlines a few original approaches. There is no point in repeating what she has already written.[102] In the end, the study of the Etymologies' medieval reception is a vast field, of which so much work remains to be done. It is more appropriate to discuss what is not known than to claim to offer even a provisional synthesis.

[101] See the chapters in Part 3 of this volume.

Still, it is worth recalling that the foundation of any study of the transmission of the Etymologies in the Middle Ages is the list of manuscripts published by August Eduard Anspach.[103] That list includes 1080 entries, but Baudoin Van de Abeele has established that only 455 manuscripts include either a complete text or a substantial portion of the Etymologies (at least two books).[104] If this seems to reduce the corpus, we should at the same time recall that at the time when Anspach wrote his list, many collections were only partially catalogued. So, there are probably more than 500 extant manuscripts of the Etymologies.[105]

So many manuscripts make a global study of the manuscript tradition impossible. Until now, work in this field concentrated on the oldest manuscripts.[106] Carmen Codoñer, who at present is probably the person who has examined the greatest number of manuscripts of the Etymologies, also drew attention to the many kinds of transformations this text underwent in the Middle Ages: selections of extracts, additions, or displacement of certain passages.[107] This is very interesting work, but it brings with it the possibility of creating a false notion of the medieval reception of the Etymologies. Although I am not able to back this affirmation with precise numbers, it seems to me that most medieval manuscripts contain the "canonical" text, close to the text as we read it today.

In 2014, I had the opportunity to study a manuscript that the private owner wished to have appraised, supported by an agreement with the Institut de Recherche et d'Histoire des Textes in Paris.[108] This 10th-century copy, which once belonged to Sir Thomas Phillipps (described in his catalogue as number 2129), was sold at Christie's in London on 23 November 2010 (sale 7882, lot 9). It contains a text broken off by lost quires at Etym. 11.1.137. Otherwise it is in keeping with the "canonical" version of the Etymologies. However, this manuscript is not without interest because it has many signs of having been handled. In particular, there is evidence of two occasions when the text was subject to systematic rereading and appropriation: one in the 12th century, resulting in the addition of many corrections all the way through; and another in the 13th century, with the addition of several entries in the margin to facilitate reading. This example proves that even "normal" manuscripts reveal interesting details of how the Etymologies was engaged with in late centuries. At the same time, it should be noted that a systematic study of the 500 or so extant manuscripts (not counting those which contain only excerpts) would easily become overwhelming.

[108] I have presented the main conclusions of this study in the 48th Congress of the APLAES (Association des Professeurs de Langues Anciennes de l'Enseignement Supérieur), held in Besançon on 29–31 May 2015. I hope the acts will be published.

The task is even vaster when the aim is to study the literary reception of the Etymologies, given how frequently the work was cited in the Middle Ages. Certainly, more and more is known about the way it was used in medieval encyclopedias.[109] But its influence goes well beyond encyclopedias.[110] Signs of it are found in medieval texts of many literary genres. Consulting any recent critical edition of a medieval Latin text will likely turn up a borrowing from the Etymologies, which need not, of course, have been the direct source. For example, of the indices of sources in the six volumes of the Corpus Christianorum, Continuatio Mediaeualis that appeared in 2014,[111] four contain extracts from the Etymologies. It can be found in the acts of a synod,[112] as well as in biblical commentaries.[113]

Such a state of affairs may seem discouraging. Studying the medieval reception of the Etymologies is like plunging into a boundless ocean. But it is also possible to see it as a fascinating entryway to medieval literature. To offer only a single example, Ernst Robert Curtius wished for a history of the literary genre of lists of the names of Christ until the time of Luis de León (1527–91)—and one of the major texts of that literary tradition is chapter 7.2 of the Etymologies.[114]

7 Conclusion

My conclusion is therefore deliberately very open-ended. In the first part of this chapter, we have seen that the composition of the Etymologies took place over a long period of time, from a first version that was probably dedicated to King Sisebut (before 621) until an unfinished version was sent to Braulio of Zaragoza around 633; but the history of the genesis of the work still has many obscurities. Then, in the second part, I have shown how the structure of the encyclopedia has been much discussed among scholars, even if, in my opinion, the interpretation proposed by Jacques Fontaine is the best one (books 1–5 functioning as a foundation for various fields of knowledge, and books 6–20 ordered according to a descending hierarchy, from God to the material world). In the third part, I have studied the concept of etymology, again underlining the research that remains to be done: Isidore's etymological theory has been well studied, but not so its concrete application in terms of the metalinguistic methods he used to formulate etymologies. In the fourth section, devoted to the sources of the encyclopedia, I have recalled that, despite recent progress, due to the impulse given by J. Fontaine after 1959 and the development of electronic databases in the 1990s, there are still many sources to discover. Finally, the fifth part examined the medieval reception of the Etymologies, an immense field of investigation, which received minimal attention. I shall repeat it: there is much research still to be done on the Etymologies. I would be happy if this essay could encourage others to engage in the exploration of this immense and still little-known work.

CHAPTER 10

Isidore of Seville's Theories and Practices of Pastoral Care and Church Organization

Céline Martin

1 Introduction[1]

Pastoral functions inform all of Isidore of Seville's work and life. Having lost his parents as a child, he was raised by his older brother, Leander, bishop of Seville and friend of Gregory the Great.[2] The nature of his education (although we do not know its exact setting), as much as the influence of the author of the Pastoral Rule, predisposed Isidore not only to take on the responsibilities of pastor, as he did when he succeeded his brother around 602, but also to devote his life and writings to consolidating and improving the way the Church of his day guided the faithful to salvation. It might even be maintained that his political thought, equally under the influence of Gregory the Great, was shaped by the notion of pastoralism.[3] This chapter, however, will be limited to exploring the ecclesiastical side of Isidore's thought. This is expressed in many of his treatises, above all in his De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, devoted to the origins of liturgical rites and the diverse functions of the clergy, and in his correspondence. It appears as well in the decisions of the various councils in which he participated, where his influence was no doubt deeply felt: the Second Council of Seville, held in 619; the Third Council of Seville at an unknown date (probably in 622/624); and the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633, three years before his death. The corpus of Visigothic sources tends to be very theoretical, hardly a helpful guide to the study of practical actions. Council records provide the evidence that, although primarily normative (primarily but not totally, since they include sentences pronounced by the bishops functioning as a tribunal), best allows us to come close not only to Isidore's thought but also to his actions in relation to Church government. In this chapter, we will undertake a cautious attempt to evaluate Isidore of Seville's achievements, in particular within the Church.

2 Strengthening the Structure of the Church

Around the year 600, the Church, understood as a complex organization of religious experts devoted to God, was already well structured enough to be able to claim to direct the Ecclesia, the whole of Christianity.[4] Yet this structure was incomplete, and Isidore worked to improve it, not only by means of his written works but also by his actions as titular bishop of one of the most prestigious sees of Hispania. His efforts were aimed at enhancing the internal hierarchy of the Church and unifying it at a hitherto unprecedented level, that of the Gothic kingdom.

2.1 Structuring the Ecclesia Vertically

The most basic dimension of the vertical structuring of the Church involves first of all distinguishing the flock from the shepherds, that is, defending and justifying the dominant position of the clergy over laypeople. Isidore was profoundly convinced of the superiority and the responsibility of the former over the latter. This is why some of his major works—like the Differences, the Synonyms, the Etymologies—put grammar in the service of pastoral duties and make it an indispensable instrument for pastors. According to this vision, only those in clerical orders, who were supposed to be better educated than the rest of the population, were capable of comprehending Scripture and Creation, and as a consequence, of acting as mediators between God and his people. Despite his admiration for Augustine, Isidore is much more elitist than the bishop of Hippo, and his views on knowledge stand far from the asceticism of Jerome or Gregory the Great, who denied the necessity of grammar in pastoral duties.[5]

So that this distinction might enter people's thinking, making the authority of the clergy over the laity acceptable, it had to be made visible, affecting physical appearance as well as behavior. From the spatial point of view, the place of each person in the church-as-edifice reflects that person's position within the Ecclesia. Although Isidore did not invent such a layout, he justifies it when he explains the origin of the choir, a restricted space reserved for clerics before the altar, forming a crown facing the lay worshipers separated by sex, modeled on how Moses had arranged the Hebrews to praise the Lord after their crossing of the Red Sea.[6] In terms of appearances, the tonsure was the major visible distinction between the clergy and the laity. But in the 6th century, its application varied from place to place. That is why the Fourth Council of Toledo, presided over by Isidore in 633, was concerned with unifying the tonsure throughout Hispania.[7] Henceforth, tonsure would consist of shaving the entire head except for a crown of hair—a crown appropriate to clerics with its echo of the crown of the choir—and the Gallic practice of allowing those tonsured grow their hair long was banned as peculiar to laymen. Finally, the ban on bishops employing a secular treasurer introduced by the Second Council of Seville in 619 and repeated at the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633 theorizes the necessity for this separation:

> It is not fitting that a lay person should act in the name of the bishop and that lay people should have jurisdiction in the Church. For a given office, there should not be two professions. It is also forbidden by divine Law, as Moses says: "You shall not plow with an ox and an ass at the same time," which means "You shall not associate in a single office men of differing professions."[8]

Chorum autem ab imagine factum coronae et ex eo ita uocatum," cited by Dell'Elicine, En el principio fue el Verbo, 79.

[8] II Seville, 9: "Indecorum est enim laicum uicarium esse episcopi et seculares in ecclesia iudicare: in uno enim eodemque officio non decet dispar professio. Quod etiam in lege diuina prohibetur dicente Moyse: Non arabis in boue simul et asino; id est homines diuersae professionis in officio uno non sociabis." This idea is repeated in IV Toledo, 48.

Beyond separating clergy and laity, Isidore also sought to more strictly define the hierarchy within the clergy. The ecclesiastical hierarchy was already well articulated in the 6th century. The bishops (some of whom, metropolitans, had jurisdiction over their suffragans) shared the sacerdocy with priests (so that the word sacerdos means both, without distinction). Beneath the bishops were deacons and clerics (clerici), that is, minor clergy. One of the canons of the Fourth Council of Toledo[9] concretizes this hierarchy by enumerating the attributes that should be restituted to unfairly deposed ecclesiastics: the stole, the ring, and the crosier for a bishop; the chasuble for a priest, the alb for a deacon; and for a sub-deacon and plain clerics, only such objects as they received at the time that they entered their order. Isidore insists that this inequality of rank obliged clerics to show respect and obedience to their superiors, the seniores.[10] This inequality also entails particular positions in the church: canon 39 of the Fourth Council of Toledo reproaches some deacons for impudently taking a place in the first choir, while priests were relegated to the second; it orders both to occupy both sections of the choir without regard to rank, so that there be no doubt that priests are superior (sublimiores) to deacons. The canon's suggestion that there were two distinct choirs in churches is difficult to interpret[11] and has to be related to another canon of the same council that established order of communion and the respective positions of the priest and the deacon (in front of the altar), the clerici (in the choir, now seen as a single area), and the populus (in the nave).[12] Whatever the details, the bishops at the Fourth Council of Toledo, led by Isidore of Seville, were clearly concerned with giving each person his place in the liturgical order, as much as in Christian society.[13] As early as the Second Council of Seville, Isidore also dealt with the distribution of prerogatives among the members of the hierarchically organized clergy. Implementing his metropolitan power, he settled conflicts among his suffragans (canons one and two); he enumerated the episcopal functions from which priests were excluded (canon seven), of which some were new, like post-baptismal chrismation. He thus strived to enhance not only clerical superiority on the laity, but also internal hierarchy among the clergy.[14]

2.2 Constructing a Church at the Level of the Kingdom

It is possible to argue that the verticalization of the Church is a long preexisting tendency, with beginnings well before Isidore's time, flourishing during the Carolingian era and culminating in the Gregorian reform of the 11th century.[15] Nevertheless, the construction of a discrete ecclesiastical unit on a scale greater than that of a province represents a new undertaking. Although Isidore does not make explicit any desire to construct a brand-new ecclesiastical unit (innovations are not usually presented overtly in the early Middle Ages), some of his efforts certainly point in that direction. Adapting the organization of the Church to the political structure of the day seems logical enough if we consider the considerable extent to which both spiritual and temporal functions assigned to ecclesiastic and civil officials were intertwined during this period.

One indicator of the inclusion of a new level spanning the kingdom of the Goths in the organization of the Church is the preeminent judiciary function Isidore seems to have assigned to the see of Toledo, beyond any "conventional" ecclesiastical structure. Shortly after 615, he called upon Bishop Helladius of Toledo to judge a bishop of Cordoba, originally from the clergy of Seville—probably Agapius, to whom there will be cause to return:

> We have learned that a Sevillian bishop in the Cordoban church has fallen from the great height of his station into the sins of the flesh and has lowered himself from the summit of [episcopal] honor into the depth of turpitude by a deplorable fall. Since the pastoral responsibility (sollicitudo pastoralis) falls on you, and divine judgement has decided that the errors of those who fail are to be dispelled by your judgement […], we most tearfully beg your holiness to receive this sinner before your holy gathering, to hear his confession, and to remove him from the priesthood by a synodal sentence.[16]

Toledo, capital of the Visigothic kingdom, was at the time incontestably the metropolis of the province of Carthaginiensis.[17] But the synod to which Isidore appealed must have operated above the metropolitan level, since the metropolitan bishop of Baetica (the province in which Cordoba was located) was Seville. The sollicitudo pastoralis, which, according to Isidore, fell to Helladius, was not the metropolitan function, but a superior responsibility, either one Isidore was trying to establish or a pre-existing one to which he appealed. This case recalls the ambiguous nature of the Toledo Council of 597 (Ramos-Lissón called it "pluri-provincial"[18]), which has come down to us only in the codex Emilianensis. It contains but two canons, of which one precisely concerns sins of the flesh by ecclesiastics, as in Agapius's case, and the context in which it was held, neither provincial nor general, is not clear. It is not impossible that, at the turn of the 7th century, before it even took on the privilege of ordaining all the kingdom's bishops (at the Twelfth Council of Toledo in 681), Toledo already exercised in practice a judicial function, perhaps based on the fact that bishops from across the kingdom occasionally spent time in the capital. This Toledan sanctus coetus (holy assembly) could have functioned as a superior court to the provincial council, rather like the Permanent Synod of Constantinople.[19] Whether or not such a superior synodal tribunal already existed during Isidore's time, sending the bishop of Cordoba to appear before Helladius, a move that may equally have been driven by political considerations,[20] served to legitimate Toledo's overarching authority and prepared the way for the see's exceptional future status.[21]

While the letter to Helladius of Toledo leaves some questions unanswered, in contrast, Isidore's attempt to institutionalize two kinds of conciliar assemblies, at the provincial level and that of the whole kingdom, seems much clearer. Councils were, in this case, no longer considered solely as a higher judicial venue, but rather as an instrument for the collective government of the Church.[22] Provincial councils which brought together the suffragans and the metropolitan bishop were well established by the start of the 7th century, and in all probability, as a cleric in Seville Isidore had participated in the council that his older brother Leander had called in the city in 590. But he was clearly responsible for establishing operating rules for provincial councils at the Toledo council of 633, as well as for introducing some modifications to conciliar functions as metropolitan of Baetica.[23] For the Fourth Council of Toledo not only recalled the Third Council of Toledo in 589, which laid down that councils should occur on an annual basis,[24] but also mandated that they be called together on a set day, 17 May, and granted them a role as courts where cases involving bishops, agents of the king, and powerful laypersons could be adjudicated.[25] Canon four gives the first version of the Ordo de celebrando concilio (Order to be followed in celebrating councils), which concerned provincial councils, as the ceremonial activity is centered on the metropolitan and his archdeacon. It is not easy to evaluate the distance between norm and practice in this first statement of Isidore's vision of government by council. The surviving acts reveal that only four provincial councils met between 633 and 711.[26] It certainly would be questionable to imagine, in the absence of textual evidence, that after the celebration of the Fourth Council of Toledo, the metropolitans systematically convoked a provincial council in every year in which a general council was not called, in keeping with canon three. However, the opposite extreme, the idea that the extant collections of conciliar deliberations might have transmitted the canons of all of the assemblies of bishops held in Visigothic Spain, also seems extremely dubious.[27] If, in fact, the impact of Isidore's project on later practice is hard to gauge, it can at least be noted, without forcing the sources, that there is a great contrast between the proceedings of the Second Council of Seville in 619, the only complete provincial council presided over by Isidore of which the entire record has come down to us, and the proceedings of the other provincial councils convoked following the Third Council of Toledo in 589. The brevity of the earlier is in contrast to the richness and the rigor of the council of 619, including its extensive citations of Scripture and elements of Roman law, and its adherence to Roman judicial procedure.[28]

But canon three of the Toledo gathering of 633 also institutes another kind of council, a general council, bringing together the bishops of the Visigothic kingdom in an alternative way, depending on the purpose:

> If the issue is a question of faith or another common cause of the Church, a general council of all Hispania and Gaul will be convoked. However, when neither faith nor the common interests of the Church is in question, it will be a special [speciale] council of each province, wherever the metropolitan will choose to hold it.[29]

The canon notably defines the jurisdiction of the general council as "all Hispania and Gaul," rather than by listing ecclesiastical provinces, which would have been more tedious but no doubt better suited to the definition of the terms of a general council. Indeed, the formulation "all Hispania and Gaul" corresponds to the limits of the regnum gothorum, although the Visigothic kingdom is not referred to explicitly. The canon refers to two geographic units, rather than ecclesiastical districts or political demarcations. Such a choice may be explained by the desire to locate the general council on a universal basis (totius Hispaniae) comparable to an ecumenical council, without drawing attention to the novelty of its founding principle. It should also be noted that the Third Council of Toledo of 589 had already adopted these geographic units in 589, perhaps upon the suggestion of King Reccared.[30]

In hindsight, the Third Council of Toledo in 589 can certainly be classed among the general councils of the Church of the Visigothic kingdom, although the category had at this moment not yet been established. It seems that the concept of the general council had its roots in Isidore of Seville's reflection on practice (the Third Council of Toledo ratified the conversion of the Gothic gens to Catholicism, a paramount "question of faith" and relating directly to the common interests of the Church), and in his desire to systematize and rank the various mechanisms that he had put in place for the government of Church. The distinction seems not to have been fully developed in his mind in 619, for the twelfth and thirteenth canons of the Second Council of Seville, devoted to the duality of the nature of Christ, would have been more appropriately the subject of a general council. The general council as an instrument of Church government, which would become a characteristic of the Visigothic regime in the mid to late 7th century, can therefore be seen as the result of Isidore's latest reflections about the government of the Church in the early 630s. Unlike the provincial councils, which do not seem to have been adopted widely, the practical success of the idea of general councils can hardly be questioned.

[30] Reccared's speech at III Toledo had required the recitation of the Apostles Creed every Sunday in "all the churches of the Hispaniae and Gaul" ("omnes Spaniarum et Galliae ecclesiae": Martínez Díez and Rodríguez, La colección, 5:101a), a measure the second canon of the gathering promulgated for "all the churches of Hispania, Gaul and Galicia," III Toledo 2.

Finally, Isidore's desire to construct an ecclesiastical edifice that incorporated the level of the regnum can be seen in his efforts to unify the liturgy of Hispania. In doing so, his efforts were congruent with developments beyond Hispania and his precise lifetime, which resulted in the late antique liturgy, at first very variable, becoming more and more fixed and codified in the 6th and 7th centuries. In Hispania, the council of 633 is a watershed, for that gathering devoted a large number of canons to the unification of the liturgy in a way that broadly reflected the order of subjects treated in Isidore's De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, as much that of the first book on ritual as of the second on the officers.[31] However, it seems possible once more to detect an evolution in Isidore's thought between the De Ecclesiasticis Officiis—written between 598 and 615 according to its editor, or even in 598, before he was bishop, according to Jacques Fontaine[32]—and the end of his life. One of its chapters, "On the various practices of the Church," shows a remarkable tolerance for diverse forms of observance as long as they do not contradict either faith or morals, and even envisages respect for local practices as the best source of protection against schism.[33] Canon two of Toledo IV declares slightly different intentions:

> We have decided that [...] henceforth we will do nothing diverse or discordant in the sacred things of the Church so that our diversity might not be presented as a schismatic error to those who are ignorant or those who > judge according to the flesh [carnales], and so that the diversity of churches may not cause the fall [scandalum] of many.[34]

In both these cases, schism is the major danger that the Church should avoid, but the De Ecclesiasticis Officiis distinguishes two kinds of observances: those which are practiced "by the whole universe," or were set forth by the Apostles or the "major councils," and those which vary from church to church, like the Saturday fast or the frequency of communion, local variations that were of minor importance. What matters is following the customs of "those among whom one lives," so as not to "scandalize" them (cause them to fall). In Toledo in 633, in contrast, scandal and the danger of schism are said to have their origins in "the diversity of churches," whatever its nature. The solution proposed by the bishops (including and led by Isidore) was the unification of the whole liturgy. There could no longer be more than one ordo orandi atque psallendi, one way of praying and saying the psalms, one modus in missarum solemnitatibus, a single ritual for the mass,[35] as also for the services in the evening and in the morning. Just as for the general councils, the scale of reference is now "all Hispania and Gaul" (omnem Spaniam atque Galliam). But here the bishops did not prudently restrict themselves to geographical notions, as the decisive word regnum appears in the justification: "so that henceforth ecclesiastical custom may not vary among us who are united by a single faith in a single kingdom."[36] Until then there had been attempts at unification of the liturgy at the level of the ecclesiastical province,[37] but applying such changes to the whole kingdom constitutes what Paul Séjourné has termed "a notable innovation."[38] The council finally supported this innovation by invoking canonical authority: "for earlier canons also decided that each province (prouincia) should follow the same usage in saying the psalms and administering religious services."[39] Multiple meanings of prouincia may be in play here, as in the 6th century the term might mean a provincial district dating back to Roman times (and therefore also an ecclesiastical province) or the territory of a sovereign,[40] thus reducing this innovation to no more than respect for the canonical letter. Religious unity, as ordered by the canon within the framework of prouincia, can thus be understood as operating at different scale levels. Nevertheless, moving the determination of the date of Easter (canon five) from the purview of the metropolitan, as had been the custom, to a prior agreement of all the metropolitans of the kingdom, is an example of the change of scale that took place in 633.[41]

[34] IV Toledo, 2: "[…] placuit ut […] nihil ultra diuersum aut dissonum in ecclesiasticis sacramentis agamus, ne qualibet nostra diuersitas apud ignotos seu carnales schismatis errorem uideatur ostendere, et multis existat in scandalum uarietas ecclesiarum."

[35] So the following canons, 11 to 18, apply to this unification of the mass.

[36] IV Toledo, 2: "… nec diuersa sit ultra in nobis ecclesiastica consuetudo, qui una fide continemur et regno."

[39] IV Toledo, 2: "[…] hoc enim et antiqui canones decreuerunt, ut unaquaeque prouincia et psallendi et ministrandi parem consuetudinem teneat."

Why did the Fourth Council of Toledo support such a change? Beyond the issue of scandal[42] and schism feared by the bishops, what was at stake was not merely the unity of the Church, but, according to Rachel Stocking, the governability of the kingdom. The "program of consensus" put forth on the level of the kingdom of Toledo sought to make conciliar decisions executable and so to assure the survival of the regnum,[43] a concept, we should recall, understood by clerics not only as a political construct, but also as having metaphysical dimensions.[44] Then again, application of this attempted unification of the liturgy was by no means swift. In 675, the Eleventh Council of Toledo once again asked bishops and abbots to put an end to the variations of religious services within the province.[45] In practice, until the time of Julian of Toledo (680–90), each church seems to have had a system of libelli, a few pages bound together containing the contents of one celebration or another,[46] easy to spread over a diocese but leading also to a degree of disorder, in the absence of a single established ritual for all Hispania. We are forced to conclude that Toledo IV issued a kind of "order of unification" without really enforcing it.[47] At least Isidore of Seville can be credited with having opened the way towards greater standardization from a theoretical point of view.

3 Guaranteeing the Quality of Ecclesiastical Mediation

As a builder of institutions, Isidore could not concentrate all his efforts on ecclesiastical structure while neglecting the quality of the building blocks. After all, clerics, mediators of the sacred, had a crucial responsibility to the laity and took responsibility for the salvation of all God's people who had no means to access His Law by themselves: "The Apostles Creed and the Our Father are like the whole Law for the little people (paruuli) of the Church, and suffice them to attain the celestial kingdoms."[48] The seeming laxity with regard to the laity, at least to the simplest or most "childlike" among them (like iuniores or seniores, more commonly used, the word paruulus designates a social group using an age metaphor), in contrast demanded much of those leading them, the praepositi Ecclesiae,[49] who were expected to be able unhesitatingly to guide the laity on the true path. This position implied that the clergy needed to be trained and overseen.

3.1 Training the Clergy

The problem of clerical illiteracy had already been discussed at the Council of Narbonne in 589, which forbade the ordination of illiterate priests or deacons, prescribed forced instruction for those who had been ordained in spite of their ignorance, and punished resistance to learning with enclosure in a monastery.[50] The Fourth Council of Toledo (633) approached the same problem in the higher ranks of the Church. Its canon nineteen repeats from earlier canons the numerous conditions closing access to the episcopate and denying ordination to "those who could not read,"[51] certainly to priests, but above all to bishops. The ability to read was, however, only the most elementary level of the education that Isidore expected of clerics, and in particular of all those upon whom fell the regimen animarum (government of souls).[52] For, as canon 25 of the council of 633 indicates, "Ignorance, mother of all errors, is to be avoided above all among the priests of God."[53] Priests and bishops (it should be recalled that the word sacerdos does not distinguish between the two) should know Scripture and the canons so as to be able to preach and edify the faithful.

Holiness unsupported by knowledge would profit only the prelate himself, whereas by his learning and his words he could instruct his flock and confront his adversaries.[54] The priest sent to serve a parish beyond the city walls, necessarily far from his bishop, would therefore receive from him a libellum officiale, a sort of aide-memoire replacing the support of the best trained ecclesiastic of the diocese for his duty of ruling souls and celebrating worship.[55] Despite this focus on the role of the priest, Isidore's own efforts as a teacher were focused on the bishop.

Episcopal schools are attested in Hispania as early as the Second Council of Toledo in the first third of the 6th century. What this teaching consisted of has been described in diverse ways. According to Pierre Riché, it was entirely religious, without a trace of liberal arts, in both Hispania and in Gaul.[56] Jacques Fontaine, however, has found instances of educated Hispanic bishops who seem not to have been trained in monastic schools (the last bastion of the artes said Riché).[57] Whatever prevailed in episcopal schools in the 6th century, the instruction that Isidore sought for pastors of souls in the early 7th century was very far from being limited to a purely religious content, as other chapters in this volume demonstrate.

A review of the whole of Isidore's works gives a clear idea of his program of clerics' training, which was certainly implemented at least in the episcopal school of Seville. The primacy he gives grammar puts us at once in the realm of the liberal arts, where grammar is the first step.[58] Moreover, the first three books of the Etymologies give a complete view of the trivium and the quadrivium, and were to a great extent the instrument of their transmission in the Middle Ages in the West, as Jacques Fontaine reminds us.[59] Some of Isidore's other works are, as one might expect, devoted to biblical exegesis, especially De Ortu et Obitu Patrum, the Mysticorum Expositiones Sacramentorum, or the De Fide Catholica contra Iudaeos. The Prooemia are, in the view of Jacques Fontaine, an unfinished collection of rather disorganized notes which might have been an introductory course in the Bible, given at Seville's episcopal school. The dedication to "Orasius" of the Allegoriae, another minor work of exegesis, might be intended for Aurasius of Toledo, which would suggest that it was transmitted to be used in an episcopal school other than that of Seville.[60] Other treatises, like the Book of Numbers or the De Natura Rerum, associate exegesis with profane learning, following a procedure Isidore often uses. His three major grammatical treatises, Differences, Synonyms, and Etymologies, also bring together Christian content and a profane approach.[61] The relatively uncomplicated language of the Synonyms has been interpreted, we should note, as a sign of Isidore's desire to place it within the reach of not only of his episcopal colleagues, but also a broader public, including priests.[62] If there is no proof of use of his historical works (the Chronicle, De viris illustribus, De Origine Gothorum) for training the clergy in the Visigothic kingdom, still, Braulio of Zaragoza's reference to them in his Renotatio should be noted.[63] Finally, in Jacques Fontaine's view, we should consider Isidore's De Ecclesiasticis Officiis a real "reference book" intended for all Christians but especially for bishops, those who presided over the officia in the double sense of services (book 1) and ecclesiastical functions (book 2).[64] In some passages Isidore speaks familiarly to the reader, whom one can imagine as an episcopal colleague.[65]

It may seem futile to attempt an assessment of Isidore's program for the education of clerics. Admittedly, as late as 675, canon two of the Twelfth Council of Toledo deplores the ignorance of the provincial clergy. Granted, all of Isidore's works were not uniformly well known in Hispania, episcopal schools functioned more or less well, depending on the personality of the bishop in charge of them, and the levels of training of many members of the rural clergy probably left much to be desired. Be that as it may, assessing the cultural level of a kingdom by the measure of one of its great men (the "Isidorian Renaissance") seems thoroughly outdated.[66] In any case, once again, written sources are far too patchy for us to conclude failure or success.

3.2 Supervising the Supervisors

The quality of the supervision of the faithful is not merely a function of the education of the clergy but also of their orthodoxy and their behavior.

Affirmation of the true faith and the fight against heretical clergy were Isidore's constant preoccupations, perhaps originating in his youth spent in a world politically dominated by Visigothic Arians, before the conversion in 589.[67] In this sense, the major profession of faith which opens the Fourth Council of Toledo recalls the very long canon thirteen of the second provincial council of Baetica, held in Seville in 619, on Christ's double nature. A key moment in Isidore's fight against heresy, as Braulio stresses,[68] was the affair of the Acephali that provoked canon thirteen of the Second Council of Seville as well as the preceding canon: "on a certain bishop of the Acephali."[69] The synod in Seville "purged" the Monophysite errors of the Syrian bishop in question, known as Gregory, and obtained an orthodox profession of faith from him. Isidore's choice of the unusual adjective acephalus is not an innocent one; he also uses it remarkably often in his chronicle.[70] According to the De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, the Acephali in his view are not so much heretics as impostor clerics, having neither leadership nor discipline, failing to respect Church hierarchy, in opposition to those who lived as they ought under the direction of bishops.[71] One should maybe understand that in his mind the verticality of ecclesiastical structures was the best guarantor of doctrinal purity, so that a commentator should not impose a clear distinction between these two problems. Some years later, two canons of the Fourth Council of Toledo were directed against the Arians. The first, mentioned above, bars former Arians from the episcopate,[72] formally reversing thus the integration of Arian bishops into the ranks of the Catholic episcopacy that had occurred in 589.

The other canon takes the position opposite that of Martin of Braga (De trina mersione, a letter of unknown date) and prescribes simple immersion for baptism so as not to seem to recognize the Arians' triple immersion, until then the practice of some Hispanic Catholics too.[73] This relative rejection in 633 of solutions adopted in the previous century certainly owes much to the preoccupations of Isidore, who devoted extended chapters of his Sentences to heresy[74] at about the same time (at least if we accept, with Pierre Cazier, that this is a very late work).[75] The question of the number of baptismal immersions is at the intersection of dogma and ritual, and bishops were supposed to oversee the ritual practice of rural clerics, according to the Fourth Council of Toledo. This oversight was supposed to occur at least twice a year: when the parish priests came to the provincial council or to litanies, they were to report to the bishop how they celebrated mass and administered baptism;[76] the prelate was also supposed to go out to inspect his clergy, by making a yearly tour through his diocese.[77] But the primary functions of the provincial council and the bishops' tour were to oversee and correct the discipline of the clergy, for which the bishop was the guarantor, as canon three of the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633 recalls.[78] The bishop was to see to it that the clerics in his diocese respected the duties and prohibitions enumerated at length in the chapter devoted to them in the De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, "On the rules pertaining to clerics,"[79] while applying to himself (under the oversight of the metropolitan and the council) equivalent or more demanding conditions.[80] The Fourth Council of Toledo repeats some essential points of discipline punished by deposition and penitence in a monastery: from young boys up to the bishop, members of the clergy must respect the rule of chastity, which in some cases did not exclude legitimate marriage;[81] they were strictly forbidden to seek the advice of diviners or magicians;[82] they were not to shed blood, either in passing sentence for capital crimes (in the case of bishops) or by participating in armed sedition;[83] they were not to disturb sepulchres.[84]

A final subject of surveillance of priests and even bishops is the preservation of the interests of churches against their own resident clergy, easily tempted to confuse the goods they were in charge of with their property. The Third Council of Toledo in 589 was already concerned with bishops' exactions from their parishes following complaints to this effect.[85] Similar complaints can be seen to have persisted in the 7th century, as the Second Council of Seville (619) forbade bishops from destroying or despoiling monasteries in their diocese,[86] and the Fourth Council of Toledo protects family foundations against bishops, even though it assigns their management (ordinatio) to them.[87] Finally, another canon limits bishops' tendency to free ecclesiastical slaves before their death, since such actions impoverished their church. These manumissions would benefit the bishops in the afterlife and harmed the church that had been confided to them; they were to be annulled by their successor, unless the Church had been compensated from the bishop's personal fortune.[88] To sum up, Isidore wished a particularly close watch to be taken on the orthodoxy of the clergy, their fulfillment of ritual, and the protection of the churches with which they were entrusted.

4 God's Church and Human Quarrels

One of the major obstacles to perfecting the ecclesiastical system imagined by Isidore was probably a function of the political nature, in the broader sense of the term, of the 7th-century Church. The Church was then a human organization with a role in the management of public affairs and in which power relations were at work that interfered with those of the great families and factions of the realm. In this setting, the repression of clerics' disciplinary infractions, especially of the defaming sin of the flesh (carnalis labes), cannot be seen as merely a theoretical matter. In some cases it must also be understood in the light of possible conflicts within the Church itself. The judicial function of conciliar assemblies, as well as the fact that canons were sometimes adopted in response to real-life problems, allow us a rare insight into two cases which point to this kind of conflict—in which a bishop was deposed by Isidore or at his urging. The first is the case of Agapius of Cordoba, mentioned earlier. The Second Council of Seville (619) specifically mentions him as being responsible for the usurpation of certain episcopal functions by the priests of the diocese,[89] without, for all that, condemning him, since he was no longer a bishop in 619.[90] That Agapius should have made such a mistake is not surprising as, untrained in Church matters, he had been named directly (statim) from secular service (militia saecularis[91]) to the priestly ministry,[92] which means he had not received in succession all of the ecclesiastical ranks. Offspring of an illustrious Visigothic family,[93] Agapius (II) was named to his position after 597 and before 612, no doubt appointed by King Witteric (603–10) to oversee Cordoba, an important city that had recently been in rebellion.[94] The need to assert his power may have led Agapius to depose some clerics unjustly or for political rather than strictly disciplinary reasons. The council of 619 presents the case of the priest Fragitanus, stripped of his position and exiled by the bishop of Cordoba "although he was innocent" and "he was sentenced by tyrannical power, not canonical authority."[95] It seems likely that Agapius was appointed in the context of the factional struggles affecting Baetica, of which Fragitanus's expulsion was one episode.[96] Isidore's letter to Helladius of Toledo asking him to depose an unnamed bishop by sentence of the synod, as analysed earlier, most certainly refers to Agapius, who would thus have been unseated for having committed "sin of the flesh" between 615 and 619, during the reign of Sisebut. He was replaced by Honorius, who sat at the Second Council of Seville.[97]

[90] He is termed "once (quondam) bishop of Cordoba" by the canon; moreover, Bishop Honorius subscribes to the acts for the see of Cordoba.

The second case, concerning Martianus of Astigi (modern Ecija), is more complex. He was deposed by a council of Seville whose acts have not come down to us (like those of the Toledan synod that probably deposed Agapius). It is nonetheless generally accepted, after Paul Séjourné,[98] that the same canon of the Third Council of Seville (probably held sometime between 622 and 624) is the origin for the canons later integrated into the Hispana (the canonical collection that transmitted the Hispanic canons prior to 711).[99] Another cleric from Astigi, Aventius, had succeeded Martianus, who could not appeal, as he was imprisoned. When the case was reopened in 638, after Isidore's death, some irregularities became apparent, including the fact that Aventius had sought false witnesses against Martianus.[100] The case is clearly part of the factional struggle within the city.[101] Still, the role played by the metropolitan seems crucial: he did not uncover these irregularities at the time of the first trial; he accepted Martianus' return to his rank, but not to his episcopal see at the Fourth Council of Toledo, over which he presided in 633;[102] and his death alone permitted the deposition of Aventius two years later. As Rachel Stocking stresses, Isidore of Seville's intervention changed a factional episode into a problem of Church government. The resulting discomfort with the extended failure of the Church to take care of the matter is indicated by the disappearance of the acts of Seville III, which remained lost at the time of the 638 retrial, possibly because Isidore did not include them in his probable revision of the Hispana.[103]

5 Conclusion

In all these different ways, Isidore endeavored to construct a stronger Church for his own times and beyond: enhancing its verticality, creating the ecclesiastical level of the kingdom, training and supervising the clergy so the flock would be correctly attended. Yet, far from playing the part of an impartial observer, Isidore also took sides in the factional quarrels that shook Baetica in his time—to what extent is hard to know. And yet again, he was capable of transmuting such conflicts into guidelines intended to organize a solid Church government, often by resorting to the most "modern" resources of Roman law.[104] A full assessment of his role in the construction of the Church of Hispania must focus as much on his factional biases as on his creative actions.

CHAPTER 11

Living a Christian Life: Isidore of Seville on Monasticism, Teaching, and Learning

Pedro Castillo Maldonado

1 Introduction

Given the context of an overwhelmingly Christian milieu in which he lived, Isidore's wisdom could only be understood as extraordinary.[1] It was destined to guide the souls—"Ars est artium regimen animarum," in the words of Pope Gregory the Great,[2] who had a profound influence on Isidore.[3] It was Braulio who urged Isidore to send him a copy of the Etymologiae (*c.*632), as he regarded Isidore's talent as a divine gift which must be shared and distributed as spiritual nourishment for salvation, wisdom, and knowledge.[4] Isidore perfectly fulfils these requirements. Far from the figure of the anonymous sage secluded in his ivory tower, he made an important impression on both the Church and the Visigothic state, known as Isidore's "tutela" (guardianship) over the Visigothic kingdom.

Isidore carried out an arduous mission as a religious and social leader, part of which was a vast plan of ecclesiastical reforms after a decade of turbulence, the 580s. Such reforms were considered essential if a confessional Catholic state was to be attained following the Third Council of Toledo in 589. Isidore's main goal was the optimal training of the consecrated persons. In an institutionalized church, it was no longer sufficient for its members to live a life of integrity (and the ideal of purity was very far from reality at the time). In particular, the main aspiration was to homogenize the different orders culturally in order to prepare them for their specific functions.

If a bishop's main duty was to teach, Isidore asks himself: how can one teach what one has not learned? As a result, the bishop's first obligation is to study the Scriptures and the canons.[5] Isidore was very well aware of the irregularities that an ignorant bishop could generate without the proper training.[6] Similar challenges faced the rest of the ecclesiastical ranks, mainly those who were in charge of preaching and liturgy. According to Isidore, it was utterly unacceptable to ordain illiterate priests.[7] It was then that he promoted a norm demanding that the clergy know how to read at least the manuale or liber missarum, which the priests would receive upon being ordained to work in rural churches.[8] Already during the Third Council of Toledo in 589 this norm had been established, if not word for word, at least in spirit. That same year, bishops gathered in Narbonne ruled that no priest or deacon would receive an ordination if he did not know how to read; and those who had been ordained illiterate had to learn to read immediately. In case of resistance, the priest in question would lose any sort of allowance and would be confined to the walls of the monastery under the authority of an abbot.[9] Naturally, monasticism is not exempt from these reforms. Isidore's doctrine and course of action regarding monastic life affect mainly organization and discipline, but also the education and spiritual life of monks.

2 Isidore's Monasticism

In order to understand the nature of Isidore's teachings in this field we should begin from two apparently contradictory but actually very complementary personality traits: Isidore's contemplative vocation, and a life of pastoral responsibilities in his position as bishop. Destined for the bishopric, he longed for the secluded life of a monk—the monk he never was.[10] It is even very probable that with time his longing for a monastic life was exacerbated. In one of the few passages in which Isidore expresses intimate feelings he appears to be overwhelmed by all his responsibilities.[11]

[8] IV Toledo 26 (ed. Martínez Díez and Rodríguez). Similarly, right education was the responsibility of every individual: accents, the correct inflections and, in general, a deep knowledge of texts were essential: Isidore, De ecclesiasticis officiis 2.11.2. On this topic, see Michael Richter, "Oral communication," Settimane di Studio 52 (2005), 454–55, 465–67.

[9] Narbonne 11 (ed. Vives). However, the bishops gathered at the Eighth Council of Toledo in 653 recognized that the number of ignorant priests was far too high and established prerequisites such as knowledge of the psalter, the songs and hymns, and how to administer baptism, VIII Toledo 8 (ed. Martínez Díez and Rodríguez).

Isidore's contemplative vocation takes us back to his early years as a youth. Leander, his older brother, previously a monk and then bishop of Seville, played a very important role as Isidore's tutor.[12] Whether or not Leander personally trained Isidore as his private teacher in a monastery or in the episcopal school—distinctions that are questionable—[13] what is certain is that Isidore received an archetypal monastic education. For instance, it is very likely that Isidore imagined that mealtimes would never lack books, to be expected in a refectory, just as had been established at the Third Council of Toledo.[14] It is not by chance that he emphasized the character of monks in the biographical entry he dedicated to Leander.[15] But Leander is not just any monk; he is cultured and well-equipped intellectually. Unquestionably, part of his tutelage would be the instruction of his brother.[16] Therefore, Isidore received a moral and religious education, but secular subjects and the classics were also part of the curriculum.[17]

This formative period marked Isidore's personality for the rest of his life. Lauded already as "preceptor" of the kingdom, in 633 he regulated the destiny of youths living among the clergy, presumably drawing from his own youthful experiences: let them live close to the church under the same roof—in a community, as it was in the monasteries—educated within the ecclesiastical discipline and under the tutelage of an elder. If they were orphans, they should be protected under the guidance of the bishop.[18] A century earlier, the Second Council of Toledo (531) had mentioned schools under episcopal supervision. In these schools, under the watchful eye of the bishop, those who entered from a very early age learned from an elder who was commissioned for this task, as in a monastery.[19]

[10] As demonstrated by Julio Pérez Llamazares, "¿San Isidoro de Sevilla, monje?" in Miscellanea Isidoriana (Rome: 1936), 39–55. The last noteworthy attempt to turn Isidore into a monk is by Justo Pérez de Urbel, San Isidoro de Sevilla. Su vida, su obra y su tiempo (León: 1940).

On the few differences regarding instruction in episcopal and monastic schools, the case of Fructuosus is noteworthy: having earlier been introduced to monasticism, he developed his profession in the school of Bishop Conantius of Palencia, Vita Sancti Frutuosi. 2.8–10.

[16] Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz, "Isidoro el hombre," in San Isidoro. Doctor Hispaniae (Seville: 2002), 73. The bishop of Merida received his nephew, Fidelis, whom he instructs with the utmost dedication, although the succession is actually assured through a more efficient means, economic blackmail, Vitas Sanctorum Patrum Emeritensium 4.4.1–7 and 17–23.

[17] Isidore showed off his excellent memory –recordatio ueteris lectionis– cultivated through long hours of lectio and meditatio. See Jacques Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique, 3 vols, 2nd ed. (Paris: 1983).

This fondness for monastic life has been traditionally dealt with as something of secondary importance in the life of Isidore, overshadowed by his role of polymath and ecclesiastical and social leader.[20] His contemporaries appear to have constructed this vision. An anonymous monk compares Fructuosus with Isidore. He expressed that Isidore, with his diligence and in his writings, has taught about the external, whereas Fructuosus illuminated the inner contemplative life.[21] In my opinion, this is a rather obtuse view of Isidore because almost all his writings are permeated with monastic spirituality. Monasticism is not a main theme in his literary production, yet it is scattered in many of his works,[22] and as a result, as we will see, it is not restricted to the monastic life.

18 IV Toledo 24 (ed. Martínez Díez and Rodríguez). This tutelage was not only formative; it was also to protect his patrimony. In fact, at the time of his death, Isidore still possessed the family's inheritance. On this topic, see Pedro Castillo Maldonado, "La muerte de Isidoro de Sevilla: apuntes de crítica histórico-hagiográfica," Habis 32 (2001), 577–96.

19 II Toledo 1 (ed. Martínez Díez and Rodríguez) regulates scholae lectorum: children of up to eighteen years of age received an education that would equip them as readers (later they would make a vow of chastity, and two years later they would have access to the subdiaconate). See the interpretation of this canon in Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz, "Problemas culturales en la Hispania tardorromana y visigoda," in De la Antigüedad al Medievo: siglos IV–VIII. III Congreso de Estudios Medievales (Madrid: 1993), 23 and n. 51. Naturally, the immediate objective is to learn letters but the fact that the children were meant to be under the care of a superior testifies to the religious nature of the education they received. On the position of the superior, see Eustaquio Sánchez Salor, Jerarquías eclesiásticas y monacales en época visigótica (Salamanca: 1976), 205–09. The fact that the act of entering is accompanied by prayer gives us an idea of the nature of this education: Liber Ordinum 7.

20 Perhaps because Isidore did not develop a systematic monastic theology. However, there is no shortage of notes on the topic, e.g. Ursicino Domínguez del Val, Historia de la Antigua literatura hispano-cristiana, vol. 3 (Madrid: 1998), 404–05.

21 Vita Sancti Fructuosi 1.13–14.

22 Jacques Fontaine, "La vocation monastique selon saint Isidore de Séville," in Théologie de la Vie Monastique. Études sur la Tradition patristique (Paris: 1961), 353–69; Adalbert de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'antiquité, vol. 11 (Paris: 2007),

His first writings already attest to his interest in monasticism. In the Differentiae Isidore develops the distinction between two ways of life, contemplative and active. Whoever desires to come closer to the first one should begin by committing to the "study" of the second.[23] This is an idea he reiterates throughout his work: one must purify oneself through good deeds before setting out to live the ascetic life. Therefore, he sets forth a plan of spiritual progression, under the influence of Gregory, in which contemplation is granted a superior value.

The Synonyma also transmit the typical spirituality of one who values monastic life.[24] Besides the dichotomy between negotium and contemplationis otium, Isidore presents a norma uiuendi of ascetic conduct. Idleness leads to lust, whereas work tires the body, and reading, meditation, and continuous prayer conquer temptations.[25] Isidore suggests that the reader, "whomever he might be," as the words of his prologue indicate, follows a set of precepts very similar to the ones observed by monks.

However, we are dealing with a theoretical proposition, as Isidore, an experienced bishop, knew very well. Isidore's pragmatic component prevails by descending from the desiderata to the pragmatic. Isidore is conscious of the various categories, which he carefully records in De ecclesisticis officiis. Each ecclesiastical office has its own dangers, moral demands, and duties. With respect to the monks, prayer, reading, dialogues, vigils, fasts, and work must constitute their daily activities. These undertakings shall take place in accordance with and under the paternal leadership of the abbot.[26] As for physical asceticism, food would be scarce, given that its sole purpose was to meet the most basic needs. Nuns would guard their virginity through isolation. Being a measured and learned man both on the subject of ascetic literature and its practical application, he points out a risk: many monks boast about their ascetic discipline, and so they seek out fame, praise and honour.[27]

Isidore's pragmatism was finally enforced in his pastoral activity at councils, cemented in the councils II of Seville (619) and IV of Toledo (633). Here, he tried to protect and promote the cenobitic phenomenon by following the path his brother had set before him in the Third Council of Toledo in 589. Besides considering monasteries as places of penitence for the clergy, the Second Council of Seville addressed monasticism in two of its canons. In the first place, it ordains that monasteries must not be damaged or dissolved, with a special cautionary tone against bishops who try to do so.[28] This is the typical defence of the economic independence of Visigothic monasteries.[29] Secondly, the council decreed male tuitio over female monasteries. Nuns would be led by monks both in economic matters—and this caution is important in order to subordinate the nuns doctrinally—and in the building itself. Finally, he insisted that convents must be located far from monasteries.[30] Leander had already stressed the need to avoid all contact between nuns and monks, given both sexes naturally burn like fire and tow.[31]

The Fourth Council of Toledo, convened during a delicate political situation,[32] was intended to unify both liturgy and ecclesiastical discipline. With respect to monasticism,[33] abuse at the hand of bishops was said to be rampant, and so it was stipulated that the power of bishops be limited to disciplining and naming abbots, as well as other aspects of monastic life.[34] At the same time a new measure was approved, giving the monastic movement great momentum: bishops were encouraged to allow the clergy to enter a monastery, if they so desired.[35] Above all, however, the council ruled on the impossibility of abandoning monastic life.[36] The uagatio was utterly prohibited[37] because these "wandering monks" are fake or pseudo monks who do not obey episcopal rules and boast of a forced asceticism; they should be secluded in the monastery.[38] Throughout his literary production Isidore could hardly conceal his suspicions about those who live the ascetic life in isolation. In his classification of monks developed in De ecclesiasticis officiis, beholden to Jerome, Augustine, and Cassian, Isidore does not conceal value judgements. The list of "positive monks" is headed by cenobites, who are characterized by life in community. These are followed by the hermits, whose ascetic practices he can only admire. The anchorites constitute the third group of monks; they count in their favour their initial training in the monastery.[39] Likewise, in the Etymologiae, making a more neutral classification,[40] Isidore points out that the anchorites should achieve preliminary training in a monastery.[41] Isidore favours the monastery as the pinnacle of contemplative life, although he knows that the first monks were hermits.[42] Finally, the Council of Toledo, led by Isidore, seemed convinced about the monasteries' capacity for catechetical instruction: it was to them that Jewish parents should entrust their children,[43] although it was seclusion, isolation, and discipline that made monasteries ideal places to achieve such ends.

In these he combines his most pragmatic perspective, derived from his capacity as bishop, with the most spiritual, which is marked by his vocation for contemplation.

3 The Rule for Monks:[44] Norms for Monks

The Regula monachorum, written *c.*615–18, is addressed to monks.[45] Isidore refers to it in a letter to Braulio as a notebook, a few pages containing rules.[46] One should not be deceived by such a modest statement. The piece abounds in literary pompousness, employing the writings of Jerome, Augustine, and Cassian.[47] Isidore's intention was to select some norms, as he himself declares, and to do so in a way that was easy to understand, in a rather rustic and accessible style, with the objective of contributing to the preservation and consecration of monks.[48] In sum, it is the work of an astute organizer permeated by disciplinary and instructional regulations.[49]

The organizational and behavioural manual was destined for the monastery Honorianensis in particular (its place is unknown), according to the indication given in the praescriptio of some manuscripts.[50] Therefore, Isidore gives precise indications to clarify and set order within a monastery over which he definitely had jurisdiction.[51] His text was not meant to replace the usual system of codex regularum; rather, it was intended to clarify it.[52] But the norms set by a bishop with jurisdiction had an unquestionably legislative element. In the eyes of monks and their abbot, the line between "consult" and "observe" would surely have been quite blurred. In the same way, given Isidore's position, it is easy to deduce that the rules could be applied to other monasteries too. From this perspective, one could affirm that it is part of Isidore's juridical pastoral, and that it reflects and contributes to the Baetican cenobitic practice of the 7th century.[53]

In the Regula Isidore adopts a purely pragmatic posture, conscious of the socio-historical context that was far removed from the one during the heroic times of the first ascetics.[54] As he indicates, it is the path suggested for those who cannot follow the old discipline of the elders.[55] In the same way, Braulio was said to have proposed a virtuous way of life for those of weak will.[56] Isidore's pragmatism leads him to possibilism: he constructs a behavioural guide achievable by the majority, demonstrating awareness of the multiple reasons for entering a monastery and recognizing that it was useless to hope that all monks would possess an extraordinary spirituality and asceticism.

It is difficult to take a stance on the most intimate motivations of those who entered a monastery, but their social origins can enlighten us. The social composition of Baetican monasteries was very diverse. It is evident that they attracted people of great social standing, such as Leander and Florentine, Isidore's brother and sister. In fact, Baetican monasticism, mainly situated in suburbia, had always had certain aristocratic and urban elements.[57] Leander in particular was very aware of social hierarchies within monasteries, dictating a more delicate treatment for those who belonged to a higher class outside the cloister. Yet the monastic movement also attracted those belonging to the lowest strata of society. Leander refers to the virgins who had entered the convent from the humblest of places, saying they should be content, as they were no longer suffering from cold or hunger.[58] Indeed, since its beginnings all kinds of people from negligible origins sought help—spiritual but also material—in the monasteries, and the Visigoths were not exceptional in this regard. Religious zeal notwithstanding, the incentives for those aspiring to enter a monastery had to be concrete: there they would find a certain social prestige and, above all, a minimal level of sustenance and protection in such a context of extreme socio-economic insecurity as 7th-century Hispania. That the only motivation for monastic vocation was religious devotion, at the Fourth Council of Toledo and led by Isidore,[59] is mere desideratum.

Another incentive to not discard the monastic life could have been the opportunity it offered for education, and for those of modest origins, as Isidore himself declares, it would have been the only possible avenue to obtain any sort of schooling.[60] Perhaps this was the case of the young Augustus in Merida (a hagiographic character), who was still unable to read.[61] Whoever entered the monastery in this condition would receive an education very similar to the one provided in the aforementioned episcopal schools, but with at least two characteristics that are worth mentioning.

Those who had decided to enter the monastery and receive the tonsure, whether it was by their own choice or that of their parents, could not withdraw; it was a way to ensure the community's stability as well as to avoid possible funding problems. The issue was so transcendental that Isidore indicated in the rules that a promise to remain in a cloister had to be given in writing.[62] Deserting the monastery was utterly impossible. The only way to leave legitimately was to be "promoted" to the office of priest.[63] This is perfectly coherent with the organization of monks as a militia and the monastery as its barracks.[64] Baetican monasticism was aristocratic in nature, and for this reason it was subjected to a fierce hierarchical discipline which did not accept any sort of "democratic" government.[65]

The bishops gathered at the council of Lérida refer back to the councils of Agde and Orléans when discussing the maintenance of monastic norms. Some monks interpreted cooptation into the clergy as a promotion, e.g. the Gallic hagiographic account in Vita Patrum Iurensium 1.6.

More relevant for its implications in education is the fact that, as opposed to the clergy, Isidore does not establish a minimal level of knowledge for entering the monastery.[66] He thought that one becomes a monk by vocation—or in the case of oblate children, by contribution. Therefore, education is something subsidiary, a means and not an end in itself.[67] This consideration has immediate consequences for the monks' education. It is not appropriate to read pagan or heretical authors, Isidore advises.[68] However, when he addresses Christians in general he values the reading of grammarians,[69] and we know very well that Isidore's library was not lacking in books written by pagans or heretics.[70] Yet the ultimate reason is simple: one essentially enters a monastery, not a school.

Nevertheless, once in the monastery a proper education became essential. Cassian had already expressed this necessity, and Isidore, who was familiar with Cassian's writings, concurred. Isidore despised ignorance, from which one could only obtain sin or heresy,[71] and of course he did not write about charismatic ascetics, such as Gregory the Great; rather, he wrote for monks who had to be trained for life in a community as well as to perform ecclesiastical services (monks could be co-opted as clergy, and monasteries could acquire the status of parish).

Illiteracy was of no concern, since the monastery would provide an education upon entry. Isidore stipulates that the instruction of novices would be the responsibility of an elder whom the abbot had appointed. He would be in charge of teaching the letters and virtues, leaving it up to the rest of the monks to provide a good example.[72] Physical punishment was part of this teaching regime. Isidore alleged that often children would pray not to be beaten in class, and in the Regula he commands that errors be chastised with physical punishment, albeit with limits.[73] With regard to the method for teaching reading, if we follow Valerius of Bierzo's philosophy, it essentially consisted in the repetition and memorization of songs.[74] Knowing the Psalms was equivalent to knowing how to read.[75] Although it was a very primary instruction, it was indispensable for gaining access to the Scriptures.

[66] Isidore only institutes a trial period, in hospitalitatis seruitium, for three months: Isidore, Regula monachorum 4.73–75.

[67] This consideration is extended to Christians as a whole. Science, naturally religious, was a means to seek God, and it was more advantageous to live righteously than to possess great knowledge: Isidore, Sententiae 2.1.3 and 11.

Besides this elementary instruction, Isidore divides the "non-manual activities" of monks between prayers, reading, and conferences (all this without lessening their workload).[76] Prayer and reading were to be executed both in private and in groups. Monks must silently listen, said Isidore, to the preaching of the abbot and respond with quiet moans or tears.[77] In a milieu of limited literacy, as in the Visigothic one, liturgy acquired a fundamental value as a means for oral learning, where memorization was facilitated by repetition and song.[78] Moreover, lectures allow the abbot to shed light on what was read, constituting himself as the sole doctrinal authority in the monastery. The character of community, as opposed to the teachings of the catechumen,[79] encouraged doubts to be raised publicly in order for monks to learn. Finally, conferences, where the monastery's rules were reviewed, would serve to correct vices and establish order.

Each activity had its precise time. The life of monks revolved around the times of their duties, although the rhythm changed according to the season.

[79] Ildefonsus of Toledo, De cognitione baptismi 17.303.

In the summer, reading was done between the third and sixth hours, whereas during the rest of the seasons monks read from the morning until three in the afternoon. Isidore stipulates that during their daily duties, which had a different ordo from the other regions, monks should internally meditate on the songs. After vespers came the meditation, or a conference.[80] During mealtime there was also a lectio diuina, where together, including new converts and students, the monks would listen to a monk seated at the centre of the refectory. Upon finishing there came the prayer,[81] and then work, reading, or meditation aloud could take place.[82] Three times a week the community came together and in silence heard the preaching of the abbot or an elder whom he had chosen.[83]

Although prayer, reading, and conferences indubitably instruct the monk, they are, above all, ascetic practices. Together with work, they constitute a solution to temptation, as Isidore expressly declared.[84] The monk should have his mind and his work always focused on God, especially in times propitious for sin, such as bedtime: no solution is more effective against the nocturnal pollutions than an adequate posture and constant prayer.[85] Leander had recommended that the nuns pray continuously and read the sacred texts assiduously, even during their work and meals.[86] Nevertheless, knowledge was not counted among the virtues the nuns should treasure. It was not so much the acquisition of knowledge (even Leander omits the discussion on what was read, trusting in general that nuns would be indoctrinated by the abbess) as it was the mandate to keep busy throughout the day. In the end it was necessary that the life of the monk be a succession (without interruption) of reading, prayer, and work in order to avoid idleness and, among other vices, the demon of fornication. In this Isidore coincides with the Regula Fructuosi. Fructuosus's norms appear to be especially obsessed with making the monks' schedule a sequence of prayers in order to avoid idleness.[87] For instance, he fixed the second hour as a transition between the first and the third, and ordered that the last prayer before going to sleep be the miserere.[88] With these practices, in primis, both they (Isidore and Fructuosus) sought to form a spiritual rather than intellectual elite.

However, alongside their spiritual and ascetic functions, prayer, reading, and lectures had an indisputable cultural value with consequences in the spiritual and intellectual life of monks. For instance, a most fundamental tool was the library.[89] In the Regula Isidori the library was under the custody and responsibility of the sacristy. Monks could take out a codex just after dawn and had to return it immediately after vespers.[90] If this was not done, the monk would have committed a misdemeanour (he would be punished with three days of excommunication, or a flogging in the case of young monks).[91] While the care with which the codices were preserved is evident, Isidore, a lover of books and therefore understanding of the wear and tear incurred due to their constant use, was more severe with other irregularities stemming from an arrogant character that could mar relationships within the community.

Although it was an episcopal library rather than a monastic one, we know of the library in Seville because of Isidore's writings.[92] It allows us to affirm, nonetheless, that Christian authors constituted an overwhelming majority of it, including sacred texts, Christian poetry, Patristic literature, and canons. In the same way, school manuals as well as secular books could also be found on the shelves of the library. Literature of pagan content is mentioned in the Versus in bibliotheca.[93] Similar works perhaps could be found in monastic libraries.

J.A. Fernández Flórez (Silos: 2003), 131–42; and for Hispania,

Perhaps we could better appreciate the position Isidore bestows on spiritual asceticism within the monastery if we contrast his norms with the aforementioned Regula Fructuosi, written decades later, in the north-east of the peninsula and within a different sociocultural milieu. The Regula Fructuosi does not constitute a vademecum of how to conduct oneself within the monastery; rather, it is a precise code of ascetic rigour with a clear eastern influence. It talks about prayers, meditation, readings in groups, congregations, and even the reading of the rule itself and the lives of priests. But it does not mention a particular reading exercise or a monastic library. In contrast to this, Isidore bequeaths individual reading an important role in the everyday life of the monk and regulates with precision the functioning of the library. This might be yet another consequence of the aristocratic character of Baetican monasticism, and the personality of Isidore himself. However, always a realist, Isidore warns against a danger: by dedicating themselves to reading some monks aim to evade physical work.[94] The monastery of Isidore was no place for the old intellectual otium.

4 The Sentences: Monastic Guidelines for Clergymen and the Population

Together with the rule mentioned above, the Sententiae are crucial to gaining a better understanding of Isidore's monastic thought.[95] However, there is a fundamental difference that distinguishes the Sententiae from the Regula: the former text is addressed to the body of converts and not exclusively to monks.

The Sententiae is Isidore's crowning jewel from a spiritual perspective. This spirituality was characteristically monastic, like the Moralia in Job, from which he derived great inspiration. The Sententiae constitutes a synthesis of his thought, an authentic intellectual testament, if we accept a late dating of creation.[96] Nonetheless, it is not a theological treatise or given to speculation; it is rather a doctrinal and spiritual manual designed to aid learning and growth.[97] From this perspective it is part of his didactic pastoral project, as his compositional skill and use of persuasive language demonstrates.[98]

Structured in three books, the Sententiae include what should be believed and, in turn, known, the process of personal conversion, virtues as opposed to sins, and how one should live life. Isidore concludes with considerations on death, as it is the culmination of the spiritual itinerary previously described: knowledge of the faith, personal conversion, and conversion or collective morality.

The first book is a testament to Isidore's didactic intentions. Disregarding theological disquisitions, it is a doctrinal exposition of the minute, gathering together all that should be known. Nevertheless, Isidore is indebted to a whole cultural tradition, which means that he cannot avoid opposing religious science to pagan and heretical stubbornness. With regards to heresy, he stresses how the Church, initially with a very simple faith, had acquired doctrinal strength.[99]

The first chapter of the second book is dedicated to the wisdom that is based on religious science (and, for this reason, a limited science). Isidore believed that it was not convenient to scrutinize that which surpasses human comprehension.[100] But, above all, this book is centred on the figure of the convert. One should first approach and teach him the fight against the flesh with tenderness, leaving brusqueness for a later time.[101] As we have previously indicated, for Isidore the exercise of an active life—the elimination of vices and doing good deeds—is a prerequisite for the ascetic vocation. In keeping with the character of the text he concludes this book with a vast list of sins.

The third book is the most important given our purpose, and it is the most original. After a few introductory chapters, Isidore addresses the different components of society, each with their own responsibilities and different precepts. In short, he traces a descending scale of perfection corresponding to the different stages of the convert. The first echelon includes monks, and then come the priests and social leaders (the monarch, the judges; the regular people generally appear as an object of the actions of others). Once again, we see that Isidore places the monk at the uppermost level of perfection. According to Isidore, the monastic profession is not without its obstacles; the contemplative life advances in intervals. Therefore, it is the way of life for very few, the chosen ones.[102] Those who are chosen must exceed the general precepts so that those who lead the monks are distinct and superior. Monastic life needs training and a set of specific rules for its preservation. The first command is the separation and disregard for the world.[103] But this renunciation must be accompanied by an interior rejection of pleasures and human nature itself. Always downcast and dispirited as a penitent, the monk should lead a life of reading, prayer, and constant work so as to avoid pernicious idleness.[104]

If we ignore work and concentrate on the "non-manual activities" of monks, says Isidore, prayer results in purification, for which reason it is considered a priority. If not reading, it is preferable to dedicate oneself to prayer, and it should be done with the utmost tenacity, forgetting all worldly matters. There are two types of prayer: the one practiced internally and prayer uttered out loud through the singing of hymns.[105] They are both remedies, as they neutralize the attacks of sensual vices. We are dealing, therefore, with a consideration which is more ascetic than mystical.[106]

Furthermore, reading, preferably the Scriptures, instructs. Isidore was of the opinion that a brief reading in silence is better—lectio tacita—than a long one out loud, hence avoiding fatigue.[107] This is so that one interiorizes the text, understands it, but above all remembers it, no longer through one's ears but through one's eyes.[108] Reading is followed by meditation. This word, meditation, should not mislead us. We are not talking about an intellectual reflection, but a repetition or "rumination" of what was read. It is, once again, a method for memorization. Both reading and meditation should be done assiduously. Isidore believes that even the intellectually weak can attain the divine mysteries through diligent reading, for this is the prize of his efforts. On the contrary, the intelligent person who neglects to read commits sin because of abandonment. As with prayer, together with private reading there are duties within the monastery and mass. Isidore explains how the latter should be received in silence; it is effective for growth and most efficient if the mind thinks of images of the divine things that have just been heard.[109] It is evident that Isidore, without disregarding the nature of praise and "dialogue" with divinity inherent in the liturgy, was very aware of its instructive value. Finally, whoever learns and understands what he read has the best aptitude for communicating it to others.

[105] On the importance of hymns, there is a theory that Isidore revised the Psalterium and composed an introduction to that effect, the Expositio in Canticum Canticorum (CPL 1220): Germain Morin, "La part de Saint Isidore dans la constitution du texte du psautier Mozarabe," in Miscellanea Isidoriana (Rome: 1936), 151–63. The third activity, incorporating discussion, dialogue, debate, or conferences, has the purpose of affixing what was learned. It is most useful to clarify doubts. In this respect, Isidore recommends figures of speech. The participants ask questions, but it is not about an intellectual discussion: Isidore emphasizes the importance of avoiding disputes, which can only lead to contentiousness and heresy.[110] A dogmatic authority always monopolizes the conference, avoiding the risk of it turning into a classical-styled altercatio. Therefore, it is not a modern seminary where there is democratic confrontation of differing ideas; rather, these processes inculcate dictates under the guise of dialogue. In any case Isidore prefers reading to conferences, perhaps because of its mystical element.

In my opinion it is important to note that Isidore places all these considerations on prayer, reading and conferences immediately before the chapters dedicated to monks. They are a sort of introduction to monastic life. Yet due to their position ahead of the chapters on the different ranks—monks, clergymen, and the faithful longing for perfection—we can deduce that Isidore aimed to propose these practices to the rest of society or at least to the group of believers wanting to attain perfection.[111] This explains why Isidore insists on how to carry out these practices and emphasized their utility, something considered superfluous in the Regula, as it was presumably familiar within the monasteries. If they were beneficial for the "professionals of conversion" or monks, they were good enough for the rest of the converts. It was by doing these activities that one could attain spiritual perfection. From this perspective, Isidore's anthropology is positive.[112]

[111] New converts must become interested in reading and meditating the sacred texts, Isidore, Synonyma 2.19.

In sum, due to his own vocation for contemplation Isidore has the highest regard for monks. He presented an ideal of a life for the believer that was spiritually highly demanding, very similar to that of the monk.[113] From this standpoint we could talk about an authentic "monastic apologetic": Isidore presents the faithful—notably the religious leaders, and to a lesser extent the laypeople, with a treatise that soon becomes a speculum principis[114]—, a set of activities that he had learned during his formative years and which are characteristically cenobitic.

The way to perfection is undertaken according to rank. Isidore distinguishes a moral and specific instruction for each member of the ecclesiastical and social body. Let us concentrate briefly on this last aspect: Isidore, pragmatic and conscious of the diverse social categories which he understood as established by divine right, advocated vertical teaching, differentiated and discretionary. It was his understanding that the most venerable should receive instruction before the rest so that through them those who were under their care would in turn be taught sound doctrine. Besides, one must be aware of the nature of the receivers of instruction, just as he recommended that doctors should be according to the sex, age, and profession of their listeners.[115] We must remember that this discretionary instruction had reached its highest level in the Regula Pastorialis when Gregory the Great—the main source of the Sententiae—offers a long list of methods of exhortation. Likewise, in the Synonyma Isidore develops the methods and content of instruction: one must not be obscure when one teaches; one must teach people according to their profession, and—always with respect to religious science—one must teach general things to all, whereas some esoteric matters should be reserved for those who find themselves closer to perfection.[116]

5 Monasteries: Cultural Hubs and the "Monasticization" of Education

Although, as we have already stated, the acquisition of knowledge was not supposed to be a primary concern for monks, two questions remain: how cultured were the monasteries under Isidore's care? Did the monks take advantage of the libraries in terms of their intellectual development? It is difficult to pronounce with assurance on this point, since we do not know the extent to which his rule was ever applied, geographically or chronologically. It is practically impossible to dissociate the literary production of Visigothic monks and bishops, from the monastery and to the clergy. Besides, the south of the Spanish peninsula seems to have fallen into a cultural lethargy after Isidore. Perhaps it would be more useful to ask about Isidore's influence in the development of Spanish monasteries as cultural centres.

Some monasteries in the Hispania of the 6th century were centres for religious teaching, an important point in the context of the supposed intellectual penury and poor training of the clergy. In fact, it was the monasteries that provided the Church with priests at that time. For instance, it was in the monastery of St Martin that little Vincent (later becoming bishop of Huesca in 557) received his education.[117] It is possible that education was essentially ascetic, but we are facing an indication of monasteries in which young monks were being trained to ascend to clerical orders.[118] We also know of Justinian of Valencia, a monk-bishop educated in the monastery of St Vincent who had a prolific literary output.[119]

During the second half of the 6th century Spanish monasticism acquired true cultural momentum[120] when a group of monks who had fled Africa under the leadership of the abbot Donatus founded the monastery Seruitanum. Its bookish culture was undeniable: they arrived with numerous codices, and it was the first monastery to abide by rules—in other words, to have written norms.[121] The abbot Eutropius would be Donatus's successor, an ecclesiastical leader, together with Leander, of the Third Council of Toledo. In his De octo

[120] At the end of the century, Licinianus of Cartagena, Epistula 1.5.1–11, argues that it would be impossible for him to continue to meet the demands of Gregory the Great's Regula Pastoralis. However, it is very possible that this statement has much rhetoric and, in any case, explains the need to do away with the consideration of monks as clergymen very well.

uitiis (CPL 1095), Eutropius demonstrates his broad knowledge, almost acting as a copyist of John Cassian. He does not hesitate to defend in a letter the authority of the abbot and the continuity of monastic rules. Isidore himself judges his text—Epistula de districtione monachorum et ruina monasteriorom (CPL 1096)—as being very useful for monks.[122] For his part, John, who was abbot of the monastery of Biclarum before becoming bishop of Gerona, was trained in the East. Besides his renowned Chronica he wrote a monastic rule—now lost—that, according to Isidore, was not only necessary for monks but also useful for all those who feared God.[123]

In the 7th century there was a multiplication of monks-bishops and, from the middle of the century, the presence of abbots at synods.[124] Culturally, the cases of John and Tajo in Zaragoza are of great significance. Concerning John, Ildephonsus states that he was more given to preaching than writing, although he created some liturgical texts and—importantly, because it indicates a level of secular knowledge—a method for calculating the date for Easter.[125] In relation to Tajo, Braulio qualifies him as an inveterate re-reader, since as an abbot he dedicated himself to the "ocia sancta."[126] Yet, indubitably the best example of a monastery as a great cultural centre is Agali, which supplied Toledo with bishops, some of them famed for their literary production.[127] Eugenius I is another interesting figure, as he initially received a monastic education. He was transferred thereafter to the priesthood, where he received a new ecclesiastical instruction. He also stood out because of his knowledge of astronomy, a science which was popular in the 7th century, possibly because of its focus on heaven or because of the prevalent interest in eschatology in this century.[128]

I believe we should concede Isidore, recognized as an intellectual and, since the mid-7th century, an auctoritas in the schools,[129] a relevant role within this cultural landscape. Isidore attempted to institutionalize a formative function already present in the Spanish monasteries of the 6th century, and he became a mainstay of the cultural horizon of the 7th century.[130] These monasteries, together with bishops, would be the continuators of Isidore's role as saviour or renovator of the classical culture, as emphasized by his colleague, confidante, and earliest biographer, Braulio.[131]

More certain is the place of honour reserved for Isidore with regards to the instruction of the people of Iberia in the 7th century. We have already spoken about the training that he prescribes for the clergy and monks,[132] only differentiated according to the particularities of cenobitic life and specific functions of each clerical ministry. Yet clerical education and monastic education share a principle: they require literacy. In this regard Braulio points out that the ascetic Aemilian (deceased in the year 574) had merely been able to memorize—perhaps he did not know how to read—the first eight psalms when he had been put in charge of a rural church.[133] The literacy Isidore tried to impose is modest, but it is important to commend what we could call "professionalization," which was possibly quite demanding for the standards of the time.[134] Despite the efforts of Isidore and his posthumous reputation, we must not forget that the aforementioned cultural enlightenment was propelled by a minority of erudite clergymen, all of them abbots and bishops.

It is evident that Isidore differentiated between elements of the laity, especially rulers—at least some of them cultured—and the general populace. To King Sisebut Isidore dedicated his De natura rerum, where he explains natural phenomena, drawing from texts written by pagan authors yet giving them a Christian allegorical interpretation.[135] The monarch, who complains about having to complete an activity that takes up all of his time (just like Isidore),[136] responds with a poem-letter on eclipses. It is not an exchange between like-minded individuals on intellectual grounds, but Isidore does compliment the king on his originality and literary knowledge.[137] By showing his awareness of (Christianized) classical culture to the Visigothic monarch, Isidore only alludes to the religious instruction of the populace: to the uncultured people one must teach simple things.[138] For them, the infants of the Church, it was sufficient to know the symbol of faith and Sunday prayer.[139]

However, Isidore's proposed instructional programme for the clergy and monks could have had important consequences for the educational level of the population at large. At the monastery of Merida, children were taught under the influence of monk-pedagogues.[140] But it is in rural areas where this educational activity acquired a special relevance.[141] Monasteries, and perhaps to a lesser extent rural churches, were in charge of taking Christianity (or Christian education) to the countryside.[142] Here, the intention was that monks and clergymen (or monk-priests) taught, paraphrasing Isidore, what they had learned: knowledge intended for religious growth, essentially based on the Bible, hymns, and liturgical books. It is a curriculum based on the auctoritas of its sources, and which sets aside the ratio (the rational thinking).[143] In this sense, rural priests behave more like an evangelical-catechetical vanguard than teachers. In return, through the litteratio biblica, they preserve Latin, written tradition, and some instrumental knowledge, such as arithmetic, as demonstrated by Visigothic notarial acts and the epigraphs on slate boards found in Meseta which show school exercises in writing, accounting registries, and short religious texts.[144]

The so-called parochial schools date back to at least the beginning of 6th century: Francisco Martín Hernández, "Escuelas de formación del clero en la España visigoda," in La patrología toledano-visigoda (Madrid: 1970), 77–80.

On this topic, see Francisco Salvador Ventura, "El monacato como instrumento eclesial de asistencia social," in La Iglesia como sistema de

The result is a strong ecclesiastical or religious imprint of instruction[145] and, in my opinion, one that derives its solid monastic character from its actors, methods, and contents. The phenomenon, driven by Isidore to a great extent, had been established at the time of his death. In the second half of the 7th century the ascetic Valerius of Bierzo taught the son of a nobleman of his region.[146] Traditional education certainly survived, which would not have antagonized Isidore, but it was limited to a select aristocratic minority, possibly linked to the most important cities.[147]

CHAPTER 12

Isidore of Seville on Law and Kingship

Andrew Fear

1 Introduction

None of Isidore's many works takes as its main subject political philosophy or secular law. Nevertheless, given his upbringing under the supervision of his elder brother, the very political cleric Leander, and his own role as a senior clergyman in the Visigothic church after he succeeded Leander as bishop of Seville, it comes as no surprise that he took a strong interest in such affairs. Moreover, his views on these matters were to have an extremely important effect on the development of political thought in Western Europe, though perhaps not in ways that he himself would have either anticipated or desired. Isidore's concern with law and politics is reflected in several of his writings. His most extensive treatment of these matters is to be found in book 3 of the Sententiae, which contains an extended discussion of the nature of politics and the duties of a ruler and his subordinates, though shorter, further, and, in terms of their impact on later periods, more important observations are to be found in the Etymologies. Moreover, the views on kingship expressed in the acta of the Fourth Council of Toledo, which was convened in 633, can also be seen as reflecting Isidore's views, as he presided over this national assembly of bishops held at a crucial moment in the Visigothic kingdom's history.[1]

2 Fas, ius, and leges

Isidore's political anthropology, like that of his predecessors, Gregory the Great, Cassiodorus, and Augustine, to whom he owes a large intellectual debt, is founded firmly on biblical concepts, but with a strong adjuncture of concepts taken from the classical past.[2] This can be seen in his approach to law. the Etymologies' focus on the meanings of individual words, Isidore first distinguishes between the general concept of law (ius) and specific laws (leges).[3] Law is then divided into that made by God and that made by Man:

> Now all laws are either divine or human. Divine Laws are congruent with nature, human ones with customs, which is why the latter differ from one another given that different practices please different people. What is 'fas' is divine law, what is 'lawful (ius)' is human law. It is fas to cross over another's land, but not ius.[4]

To complicate matters, Isidore then offers a further threefold definition of law, retaining divine law but subdividing human law into ius civile and ius gentium. This new definition follows the threefold division of law by the classical Roman jurists and takes its terminology from them.[5] However, Isidore modifies the classical model so that for him ius civile marks the practices of a particular group and ius gentium the regulation of relations between different groups. Arguably this new definition of the ius gentium—the term had been used by the classical jurists to mark practices common to all groups of men—makes Isidore the father of international law as it is understood today.[6]

Isidore's first category of law, which, again, somewhat confusingly given his prior use of fas, he is happy to style in conformity with the Roman jurists, ius naturale, draws heavily on the classical tradition, though once again with important modifications. Ulpian had defined ius naturale as "what nature teaches all animals."[7] He later also states that under natural law all men are free and equal.[8] The right of possessio naturalis, use of something without a wish to become its owner, is also admitted, though this caused some confusion in legal circles.[9] For the classical jurists the law of nature is always equitable and good and derives from the workings of reason.[10] Isidore was happy with the majority of these arguments, though, as a Christian, he saw natural law as derived from God, the source of all good, rather than human reason. As the opening of the Sententiae puts it: "the highest good is God," summum bonum Deus est.[11] This was not, in fact, as great a deviation from the classical tradition as it may at first seem. For Cicero true law was also of divine origin and existed prior to any man-made dispensation.[12] Isidore firmly excludes animals in his definition of natural law. Such a notion would be incompatible with the account of creation in Genesis, where man is given rule over brute creation.[13] Perhaps again inspired by Cicero, Isidore also adds some points of what he, and we, would regard as natural justice, which can only apply to men. His definition of Natural Law is that this is that which is > common to all nations, and, because it exists everywhere through the impulse of nature, it is not kept in place by any regulation: it is the union of a man and woman, the bearing and rearing of children, the common possession of all things, one form of liberty for all, and the right to possess whatever is taken from the sky, the earth, or the sea. Also the right of the return of something lent or money deposited, and resistance by force to violence. Now this, or whatever is similar to it, is never held to be unjust, but natural and fair.[14]

Isidore's seeming identification of God with an idealised nature, with law communicated to creation "by the impulse of nature," instinctu naturae, was to remain an important part of European legal thinking for centuries. In particular, in the 12th century Gratian of Bologna took Isidore's definitions of law as the starting point in his Decretum of Canon Law, whence they became a key aspect of the legal debates of the Middle Ages.[15] During this time they gave rise to the slogan natura, id est Deus, "nature—that is to say God." On one level Isidore would have been horrified at the pantheism that some have seen implicit in these words, but on another he would probably have been in agreement, if "nature" is taken to mean that which is pre-existent and non-contingent. After all, we are told that natural law is communicated by natural impulse, and that impulse, Isidore would have argued, is placed in His creation by God. The Isidorean concept of natural law has been attacked harshly by some. "Isidore had a genius for misinforming when he intended to instruct. His definition of natural law is no exception, indeed it may be his triumph in that mode" is, for example, the verdict of Greene. Nevertheless, Isidore's categorisation is as clear, if not more so, than many produced at a later date. Although his work is a crucial part of the transmission of the doctrine of natural law theory to later generations, perhaps his most important legacy in this field was the influence that his definition of this concept had on the thought of St Thomas Aquinas.[16]

Isidore's ideal state is therefore one where all are equal before their creator (omnium una libertas) and have equal access to the resources of the earth. What an individual then takes from these resources is his own, and he has a right to its return and a right to resist coercion.[17] Life in the Garden of Eden seems uppermost in Isidore's mind, though the right of resistance suggests that all is not ideal in paradise. It is a life that would now be characterised as that of self-defence was a natural right, (Pro Milone 4.10), along with the right of a man to secure the necessities of life for himself rather than others, though he also notes that natural law forbids self-enrichment at another's expense (see the extended discussion at De Officiis 3.5.21–23).

[15] For Gratian's debt to Isidore, see: A.P. Monahan, Consent, Coercion, and Limit: The Medieval Origins of Parliamentary Democracy (Kingston: 1987), 33–34, 84.

[16] For a survey of Isidore's influence, albeit one which is very hostile to him, see R.A. Greene, "Instinct of Nature: Natural Law, Synderesis, and the Moral Sense," Journal of the History of Ideas 58 (1997), 175 of this article. Greene appears to be unaware of the theological reasons which led Isidore to exclude animals from his definition.

[17] These rights also form the basis of Isidore's definition of a just war at Etymologiae 18.1.2, "A just war is one waged after a declaration to restore taken property or in order drive back an enemy" ("Iustum bellum est quod ex praedicto geritur de rebus repetitis aut propulsandorum hostium causa"). The influence of Cicero on Isidore is strong here, see Cicero De Re Publica 3.23.

primitive hunter-gatherers, namely one of simple self-sufficiency. There is no place in Isidorean natural law for either communism or capitalism as the modern world knows them.

3 Law, Politics, and Sin

Yet this primitive, Edenic state exists nowhere, and complex, hierarchical arrangements which have taken away the una libertas of natural law are everywhere to be found. Isidore could have drawn the same conclusions from this state of affairs as John Ball did in the 14th century,

> When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then the gentleman? From the beginning all men by nature were created alike, and our bondage or servitude came in by the unjust oppression of naughty men. For if God would have had any bondmen from the beginning, he would have appointed who should be bond, and who free. And, therefore, I exhort you to consider that now the time is come, appointed to us by God, in which ye may (if ye will) cast off the yoke of bondage, and recover liberty.

However, he did not. Instead, taking his lead from Gregory the Great, whose Moralia he follows closely here, Isidore argues that hierarchy appeared in man's affairs as one of the consequences of the Fall and that rulers are appointed by God.[18] His key text here is Romans 13:1–2: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation."[19] That said, Isidore is in no way an apologist for tyranny, and his views on the genesis of politics have served as an important intellectual brake on absolutism.

[18] See Gregory the Great, Moralia in Job 21.22 and Regula Pastoralis 2.6. Gregory was a close friend of Isidore's elder brother Leander and had dedicated the Moralia in Job to him. It is not surprising therefore to find that he had a strong influence on Isidore's thinking. Apart from this personal connection, Gregory's works were in general much sought after in Visigothic Spain.

[19] See also Cassiodorus, Complexiones in Epistolas Apostolorum: Epistola Scti Pauli ad Romanos, PL 70, 1329: "He [i.e. St Paul] says that we ought to be subject to all powers ordaining justice since power is given by God and he who strives to defy the ordinances of the judiciary is seen to fight against God" ("omnibus potestatibus iustitiam praecipientibus dicit esse debere subiectos quoniam potestas a Deo datur et Deo videtur velle resistere qui ordinationi iudiciariae nititur obviare").

In the Sententiae Isidore makes it clear that politics arose as the consequence of sin and rulers as a product of God's mercy in response to sin.

> Because of the sin of the First Man the penalty of servitude was brought down on mankind by the Godhead and as He saw that libertas was unsuitable for some, for these in His mercy He imposed servitude. This came about through the sin of the human race, but God in His equity divided up life among men, making some servants and others lords in order that the license of doing wrong by those who served might be restrained by those lording it over them. For if all were without fear, who would there be who could keep anyone from wrong-doing? And so princes and kings were chosen among the nations so that through the dread they inspired they could restrain their peoples away from evil and through laws coerce them into right living.[20]

This pessimistic view of law-making as something engendered only by necessity is repeated in the Etymologies. Here, having posed the question, "Why was law made?" Isidore's reply is that so that "by fear of the laws human audacity might be curbed, innocence be safe amid the wicked, and that among the impious themselves their means of doing harm be restrained through fear of punishment."[21] Isidore also has firm views on the sorts of laws that should be enacted. These are characterized by both idealism and a firm pragmatism. Laws should be "noble, and just" but also "possible, according to nature, according to the customs of the country and befitting their time and place, necessary, useful, and clear so that it contains nothing deceitful through its obscurity, and written not for private advantage but for the common good of all citizens."[22] It is unsurprising that Isidore wishes laws to be good laws; more important is his insistence that legislation should be practical in its scope, thus eschewing the notion of utopian law-making, transparent in its intent and beneficial for all. His requirement that law be in conformity with ius naturale and also congruent with local practice is an equally important point that the essence of law may be refracted in different ways in different places and times. Overall, we see in his outline of good legal practice a devoted Christian, but also an intensely practical thinker.[23]

[20] Isidore, Sententiae 3.47.1: "Propter peccatum primi hominis humano generi poena diuinitus inlata est seruitutis, ita ut quibus aspicit non congruere libertatem, his misericordius inroget seruitutem. Et licet per peccatum humanae originis, tamen aequus Deus ideo discreuit hominibus uitam, alios seruos constituens, alios dominos, ut licentia male agendi seruorum potestate dominantium restringatur. Nam si omnes sine metu fuissent, quis esset qui a malis quempiam cohiberet? Inde et in gentibus principes regesque electi sunt, ut terrore suo populos a malo coercerent, atque ad recte uiuendum legibus subderent."

[21] Isidore, Etymologiae 5.20.1: "ut earum metu humana coerceatur audacia, tutaque sit inter inprobos innocentia, et in ipsis inpiis formidato supplicio refrenetur nocendi facultas."

Given his theological outlook, Isidore holds that the state and its legal apparatus are necessary evils for mankind, designed to check the growth of sin. Secular rulers are a purely negative good, present as an act of divine mercy to alleviate the consequences of wrong-doing. Without the entry of sin into the world, there would be no need for them, and indeed their actions and elevated position would be entirely unjustifiable under the terms of natural law. Isidore spends a great deal of time on the deterrence rulers can effect and is clear that theirs is a good and necessary duty, "Good power is that which, when given by God, coerces the wicked man by fear so that he does not sin rashly." However, he is swift to add to this, "Nothing is worse than to have the power to sin freely, and nothing more unhappy than happiness obtained through acting wickedly." What immediately follows this comment in the text shows that he is thinking not of the ruled but the ruler when making these strictures: "He who exercises his temporal power well in this world, will reign forever and exchange the glory of this world for eternal glory. But those who hold sway wickedly over their kingdom, after their gleaming robes and shining gems, they go down naked and wretched to eternal torment."[24] Perhaps we can detect a note of pessimism manifesta quoque, ne aliquid per obscuritatem in captionem contineat, nullo privato commodo, sed pro communi civium utilitate conscripta."

[23] Isidore shows himself here to be part of the particularist school of thought, which in England finds its best expression in Edmund Burke, who makes the same point in his "These metaphysic rights entering into common life, like rays of light which pierce into a dense medium, are, by the laws of nature, refracted from their straight line. Indeed in the gross and complicated mass of human passions and concerns, the primitive rights of men undergo such a variety of refractions and reflections, that it becomes absurd to talk of them as if they continued in the simplicity of their original direction," The Works and Correspondence of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, vol. 4: Reflections on the Revolution in France (London: 1852), 200–01.

[24] Isidore, Sententiae 3.48.5b-6: "Potestas bona est quando Deo donante est, ut malum timore coerceat, non ut temere malum committat. Nihil autem peius quam per potestatem peccandi libertatem habere, nihilque infelicius male agendi felicitate. Qui intra saeculum bene temporaliter imperat, sine fine in perpetuum regnat, et de gloria saeculi huius ad aeternam transmeat gloriam. Qui uero praue regnum exercent, post uestem fulgentem et lumina lapillorum, nudi et miseri ad inferna torquendi descendunt."

in the fact that the just ruler in this discussion is placed in the singular, while wicked rulers are found in the plural. Isidore notes that temptation is greater for kings than their subjects, and thus their fall too can be greater.[25] However, he is even more worried that a wicked ruler will almost inevitably corrupt his people: “For a king who rushes into vice, quickly shows where the path of sin lies. Thus it was said of Jeroboam who sinned and made Israel sin. For whatever ascribed to him was perpetrated by his example by his subjects.”[26]

4 The Nature of Kingship

Given his concerns, Isidore is eager to emphasise the solemn obligations of kingship, taking great pains to stress that a king, properly so called, will be a just ruler.[27] As has been seen, he is all too well aware of the temptations that secular power presents and that a ruler may be seduced to abuse his authority. The Sententiae dwells on this problem at some length. Isidore begins with the assumption that a truly just man would in fact eschew the world and seek a contemplative life. However, those who assume secular office should do so with due humility. Isidore uses the Bible to underline his point: “This is shown by the example of the Apostle who declined to use the power given to him even for justifiable reasons while he was able to do so, but showed a lowly demeanour in the midst of those over whom he was lord.”[28] Kings should be mindful that they are in essence no different from their subjects.[29] Here, again, Isidore takes his lead from Gregory the Great, who notes that masters as well as slaves should be admonished if "they do not recognise that those they hold in subjection because of their condition are their equals by reason of their community of nature." Gregory wishes such rebukes to make them "acknowledge themselves to be the fellow-servants [i.e. of God] of servants."[30] Isidore develops this point in a theological way. For him baptism was the equivalent of unction with chrism, and hence all Christians comprised a "priestly and royal people."[31] Thus, the commons, if faithful to the church, are the limbs of the body of Christ and should be treated accordingly.[32] This spiritual equality means that kings, as well as being respectful of their subjects and working for their general good, should equally be bound by the laws which they enforce on others.[33] Isidore's view rests again on biblical grounds. Here, it is Christ's dictum that "with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."[34] The notion that the law should apply to all, including the legislators themselves, was in direct contrast to the formulation of classical Roman law, which held, to the contrary, that a ruler was not bound by the law.[35] Isidore's view of equality before the law was quoted directly by Gratian in his Decretum and thus passed to other medieval thinkers, such as John of Salisbury.[36] It anticipates Magna Carta by almost 600 years. Isidore is also insistent that the exercise of law be tempered with mercy. In his emphasis on mercy we can perhaps see the influence on Isidore's thinking of Ambrose, who held that the purpose of the state was to provide justice and happiness.[37] Mercy for Isidore entailed in particular that a ruler be concerned as much, if not more, with restitution for those who have been wronged as he is with punishment of the guilty.[38]

Let the powerful powerfully bear their torments for to him to whom more is entrusted, the more will be required from him, including interest upon his sins” (“Quanto quisque in superiori constitutus est loco, tanto in maiori uersatur periculo; et quanto splendoris honore celsior quisque est, tanto, si delinquat, peccato maior est: Potentes enim potenter tormenta patientur. Cui enim plus committitur, plus ab eo exigitur. Etiam cum usura poenarum”).

Most importantly of all for the future, Isidore insists that kingship resides not in a person, but in the qualities of that person. As such it can be lost, if those qualities are abandoned: "Kings are named from acting aright, and so the name of king is held by doing aright and by sinning it is lost."[39] In this he follows Cassiodorus, who is equally insistent that kingship is a gift from God and that true kings are those who are just and self-restrained.[40] Isidore's insistence on kingship being contingent on righteous behaviour is repeated verbatim in the most quoted and influential of Isidore's reflections on rulership which is found in book 9 of the Etymologies. Here, "king"/rex is defined as follows:

> Kings (reges) are so called from ruling (regendo). For just as a priest is so-called for sacrificing, so a king too is so-called from ruling. However, he who does not correct (corrigit) is no ruler (regit). Thus the name of king is held by doing aright and by sinning it is lost. Whence came the proverb of the ancients 'If you act aright, you will be king, if you do not, you will not.' The particular virtues of a king are two in number: justice and piety. However, piety is the more lauded in kings as justice by its very nature is severe.[41]

[38] Isidore, Sententiae 3.50.3: "To return wrong for wrong is a just exchange, but he who adds clemency too justice does not return wrong for wrong to the guilty, but good for wrong to those who have suffered" ("Reddere malum pro malo uicissitudo iustitiae est, sed qui clementiam addit iustitiae, non malum pro malo culpatis reddit, sed bonum pro malo offensis impertit").

[39] Isidore, Sententiae 3.48.7: "Reges a recte agendo uocati sunt, ideoque recte faciendo regis nomen tenetur, peccando amittitur."

[40] Cassiodorus, Expositio Psalmorum, Ps. 137.4: "The kings of the earth are corporally masters through the gift of the Godhead. For that man who is shown to be a slave to sin is not properly designated a king. What he [David] calls all specifically signifies religious and moderate men for we see that many kings of the gentiles are enslaved by bestial sins or besmirched with wicked religious beliefs" ("Reges terrae sunt qui corporibus suis divinitatis munere dominanantur. Nam ile rex vere non dicitur, qui vitiis servire monstratur. Quod vero addidit omnes specialiter religiosos ac moderatos viros designat, quando multos reges gentium videmus aut vitiis feralibus subdi aut prava religione maculari").

[41] "Recte igitur faciendo regis nomen tenetur, peccando amittitur. Vnde et apud veteres tale erat proverbium: 'Rex eris, si recte facias: si non facias, non eris.' Regiae virtutes praecipuae duae: iustitia et pietas. Plus autem in regibus laudatur pietas; nam iustitia per se severa est," Isidore, Etymologiae 9.3.4–5. As can be seen, Isidore strengthens his argument, and emphasises his message, by a substantial amount of word play.

Here, we see a more concise, but identical, version of the Sententiae's dogma. It is enhanced with an appeal to the classical past. Isidore's pithy proverb, rex eris si recte facias, si non facias, non eris, is an adaptation of a line of a Roman refrain itself old when adapted by the 1st-century B.C. poet Horace.[42] Isidore's slogan was to have powerful echoes in the political thought of the Middle Ages and beyond.

The importance of just rule to Isidore can be seen by the unforced appearance of this theme in sections of the Etymologies where entirely different matters are being discussed. In chapter 29 of the first book, we are told that the etymology of some words derives from their causa, or action,[43] and the example given is that of reges (kings), which we are told derives from recte agendum, "acting rightly."[44] Two chapters later, Isidore explains to the reader that a definition called a differentia is an implied difference in sense between two related words which separates their meaning. The example he chooses to use to illustrate his point is the differentia between a king and a tyrant: "When it is asked what difference there is between a king and a tyrant, the differentia is set forth that defines each of them: namely that is a king is unassuming and self-controlled, whereas a tyrant is impious and harsh."[45] The same contrast is used in the second book of the Etymologies to explain Isidore's seventh form of definition of words, again that of differentia, or in Greek κατα διαφοράν: "a king is unassuming and self-controlled, whereas a tyrant is cruel."[46]

For Isidore a king is to be judged by his actions rather than his words;[47] a consequence of this is that he is responsible for the behaviour of his underlings, and the appointment of bad judges is therefore a sin that rests at the door of the ruler.[48] For Isidore judicial corruption is a widespread and very serious matter—as much time is spent in the Sententiae on the need for judges to be just as there is on the obligations of kings. It is not a matter on which Isidore has much optimism:

[43] The alternative for derivations is ex origine, ex nomine derivationum, ex nominibus locorum, or being of barbarian derivation.

[44] Isidore, Etymologies 1.29.3: "Etymologies of words are derived from either from their action such as 'kings' from acting rightly" ("Sunt autem Etymologiae nominum aut ex causa datae, ut 'reges' a recte agendo").

[45] "ut cum quaeritur quid intersit inter regem et tyrannum, adiecta differentia, quid uterque sit definitur; id est, rex est modestus et temperans, tyrannus vero inpius et inmitis," Isidore, Etymologiae 1.31.1.

[46] "rex modestus et temperatus, tyrannus vero crudelis," Isidore, Etymologiae 2.29.7.

[47] Isidore, Sententiae 3.49.2: "He who rightly makes use of his power over his kingdom, establishes the substance of justice by his deeds rather than his words" ("Qui recte utitur regni potestatem, formam iustitiae factis magis quam uerbis instituit").

[48] Isidore, Sententiae 3.52.1: "A crime to be held the responsibility of princes is the appointment, against the will of God, of wicked judges over the people" ("Ad delictum pertinet principum, qui prauos iudices contra uoluntatem Dei populis fidelibus praeferunt").

> The people suffer more at the hands of wicked judges than the most bloodthirsty of foreign enemies. For no bandit is as avaricious towards foreigners as a wicked judge is towards his own. While brigands lie in wait in dark, out-of-the-way passes and set their snares there, these men openly rage in the rapacity of their greed. Foreign foes merely seek the blood of others, judges, like the cruellest butchers of their fellow citizens that can be imagined, exterminate the lives of their subjects by their oppression. Those who destroy are many, and rare are those who rule their people with the moderation of the law.[49]

Nor does the problem end with corrupt judges. Isidore also complains that > the majority of those who are good judges have rapacious servants. They should be pictured, someone says, as Scylla is drawn and described: namely that she has a human form, but one girt and surrounded by dogs' heads. In like fashion, it happens that certain office-holders' humanity is thrown into confusion by the iniquity of their wicked associates.[50]

Echoing his wish for education in all parts of the social hierarchy,[51] Isidore believes that the ignorant along with the wicked should be excluded from the ranks of judges, as their ignorance means that they are unable to understand the law.[52] Like the king, a good judge will be the servant of his people and, continuing another theme which runs throughout Isidore's works, will exercise his duties correctly, but temper them with mercy.[53]

[49] "Grauius lacerantur pauperes a prauis iudicibus quam a cruentissimis hostibus. Nullus enim praedo tam cupidus in alienis quam iudex iniquus in suis. Latrones inaccessis faucibus ac latebrosis latentes insidias ponunt, isti palam rapacitatis auaritia saeuiunt. Hostes in aliorum sanguinem tantum intendunt; iudices, quasi crudelissimi carnifices ciuium, oppressione sua subiectorum uitam extingunt. Qui enim destruant multi sunt, rari sunt qui populos legum moderamine regant," Isidore, Sententiae 3.55.7.

[50] "Plerumque et boni iudices sunt, sed ministros rapaces habent. Non aliter quibusdam potestatibus accidit ut ipsorum humanitatem inmanitas iniquorum sociorum perturbed," Isidore, Sententiae 3.55.10. The reference is perhaps to Virgil, Eclogues 6.75, or Ovid, Metamorphoses 14. Roman authors often use Scylla as a metaphor for sexual rapacity, which may be an undercurrent in Isidore's comments here; for a discussion of this aspect of Scylla, see M. Govers Hopman, Scylla: Myth, Metaphor, Paradox (Cambridge: 2016), 230–53.

[51] A constant care found in Isidore's writings is that the clergy be educated, see Isidore, Sententiae 3.35.

5 The Church and Kingship

How, then, is a king, and indeed his subordinates, to be pious and just? For Isidore the answer is obvious: by being a good Christian in general and by being mindful in particular that he holds his position in trust from God, to Whom he will in the end have to render an account of his acts. This is all the more important because, again like Cassiodorus before him, Isidore concedes that there is no physical power able to coerce a king:

> If he becomes ensnared in vice, it is difficult for a king to change for the better. A sinning people fear their judge and are coerced from doing evil by the laws. However, kings, coerced only by their fear and terror of hell, rush freely and headlong there and fall through the abyss of license into every form of vice.[54]

It is here, therefore, that the church holds a crucial role in Isidore's thinking, as it provides a moral compass for the monarch. As Christians, secular rulers still owe a duty of moral obedience to the Church[55] and will be held to account by God for the way they have behaved towards it and furthered, or failed to further, its ends.[56] Moreover, if a true king is one who was just and merciful, who is a better judge of which individuals conform to these criteria than the Church? Isidore strongly insists that the clergy (from whom he expects as much rectitude and humility as he does from kings and judges) have a duty to defend the poor. They are not to be reticent in criticising the wrongs of secular authorities when they encounter them, given that they are the only defence available to the victims. Isidore is appalled that "many" office-holders in the church are silenced through fear of losing favour or worse. His shock is shown by the verbatim use in the text of two biblical exempla, including God's direct command to Jeremiah: "Thou therefore gird up thy loins, and arise, and speak unto them all that I command thee: be not dismayed at their faces, lest I confound thee before them," from which he deduces that "thus it is shown that not to fear is a gift from God."[57] Perhaps even more startling is the use of the exclamation "the shame, the pain of it — sed heu! pro dolor!" when Isidore further laments that all too often this reticence betrays a worldly interest on the clergy's part, or even complicity in what has not been denounced.[58] On the other hand, if the poor are oppressed, good priests

Isidore may have found his inspiration for these arguments from Ambrose, who had argued passionately for freedom of speech for clerics in the face of secular disagreement.[60]

Given the strength of feeling expressed in the Sententiae, it is not surprising that this duty is also laid down specifically for bishops in the acta of the Fourth Council of Toledo, over which Isidore presided. Here it is also couched in strong language, but tactfully the king (who was also present at the Council) is assumed to be the last resort of the righteous and never a felon himself. Bishops are enjoined first to reprove the wrongdoers themselves, but if they remain obdurate, report them to the king so that "royal power may force from their wickedness those whom a bishop's warning did not move." Bishops failing this duty are to be tried for neglect at the following council.[61]

Isidore's vision for the Visigothic kingdom was thus one of a pious secular ruler working in harmony with a Church which would be fearless in its moral duty to its flock and ensure that the king was a just ruler, and thus a true king. This approach is similar to that of Pope Gelasius, whose letter to the Byzantine emperor Anastasius written in 494 also argues for two ruling authorities, one secular and one religious.[62] But while Gelasius argued for the superiority of the church on the grounds that it would give its judgement to God on the secular power, Isidore, as has been seen, believes that secular rulers will have to give that account directly to God. For him the moral superiority of the church is deduced not from his views on the Final Judgement, but rather those on the Fall. There is no question in his thinking of a wish for a "theocratic" state directly ruled by bishops, but he does clearly insist that the Church's voice be listened to, and acted upon, by the secular powers. This is unsurprising, given that the enforcement of right religion and the suppression of sin was, after all, the only justification for the presence of kings at all: "What the priest cannot effect by his preaching of the faith, let that worldly power command though the fear of punishment."[63]

6 Biblical Foundations

Isidore's ideal state owes its theoretical foundations to the Deuteronomic approach to kingship in the Old Testament. This sees the need for the king to act justly, but it moves the locus of defining justice from the king to the religious. Both at the time of Deuteronomy's composition and in Isidore's own day, this was a radical approach.[64] In particular Isidore had departed from the classic formulation of the classical jurist Ulpian, who held that a ruler was not bound by the law and whatever pleased him carried the force of law.[65] In stark contrast to the Roman jurist's assertion that the ruler is above and, in fact, the source of law itself, Isidore insists that the teachings of the Bible provide external objective criteria which allow us to judge whether a ruler or his laws truly belong to these categories. He finds a biblical model for his vision of the ideal ruler in King David:

> He who rightly exercises kingly power, ought to excel all others so that the more he shines forth at the peak of honour, the more he will conduct himself with a humble heart, setting before himself as an example of > humility, David who did not swell with pride because of his merits, but humbly abased himself, saying 'I walk as one contemptible and shall appear contemptible before the Lord who chose me.'[66]

The Bible presents David as precisely the secular auxiliary of the Church of the form that Isidore envisages his ideal monarch would be:

> I will appoint one shepherd over them to pasture them, My servant David; he shall pasture them and be their shepherd. I, the Lord, will be their God, and My servant David shall be prince among them … My servant David shall be prince over them, and there shall be one shepherd for them all; they shall live by My statutes and carefully observe My decrees.[67]

David owed his position, as had his predecessor, Saul, to the prophet Samuel, who had anointed him as God's chosen ruler.[68] He was a general of the first order and an effective secular ruler. He was also, a feature of which Isidore no doubt approved, merciful. David was anointed before the demise of Saul, an important point, as it showed how a ruler could cease to be a king through bad behaviour and its consequences. After God rejected Saul because he failed to obey His commands, he lost his sanity and his victories turned to defeat, resulting eventually in his own death and the extinction of his family at the hands of the Philistines.[69] In contrast, David's fidelity to God is rewarded with the extension of his line, which was ultimately to culminate in Christ Himself.[70] He is a flawed individual who sins, but he repents of those sins and shows himself willing to accept prophetic authority and chastisement by it.[71] Isidore's use of David gave the Israelite king a new lease of life as an exemplary monarch. He was to remain the ideal for kings throughout the Middle Ages, being praised by the Irish grammarian Sedullius Scotus in the 9th century for his faithfulness to David's words are a paraphrase of 2 Sam. 6:22 referring to David's dancing before the Ark of the Covenant. Isidore has lifted them entirely out of their context to support his point.

It is unclear if, as part of his championing David, Isidore was thinking about the practice of royal unction in his own day.[73] This ritual would have been ideal for his vision of the state, as it would mean that any legitimate king would need to seek the approval of the church for his rule. The first attested unction of a Visigothic king, that of the King Wamba, as recorded in Julian of Toledo's Historia Wambae Regis, who was anointed at the royal villa of Gerticos in 672, postdates Isidore. Isidore does discuss unction in the Etymologies, but only in regard to its practice in ancient Israel.[74] Nevertheless, his reference is found in the midst of a discussion of the sacraments of the Church current in his own day, which has been seen as suggesting that the rite was in place when he wrote. Moreover, the Fourth Council of Toledo makes two explicit references to David as an anointed king when insisting on the necessity of loyalty to the king of the day, Sisenand (631–36). These proof texts make little sense if the king concerned had himself not been anointed. King believes that the ritual had been introduced shortly before the council in 631 to legitimate Sisenand, whose coup had pushed aside the previous king, Swintila (621–31).[75] This is by no means the only possibility. The practice could have begun during Hermenegild's abortive coup against his father, King Leovigild (579–84). This attempted usurpation took on a strong religious colouring when Hermenegild converted from Arianism to Trinitarianism. According to Gregory of Tours, at his conversion Hermenegild took the name John and was indeed anointed, presumably by Isidore's elder brother Leander, who was bishop of Seville at the time.[76] Once religion had been dragged into politics in this way, it would be quite plausible that the practice was adopted by Leovigild's younger son, Reccared, when he converted to Trinitarian Christianity on his accession to the throne in 589.[77] Nor can it be ruled out that a similar, but Arian, ceremony had been held still earlier for Leovigild himself. Leovigild was in many ways the founder of the unitary Visigothic kingdom, and we are told by Isidore that he was the first to surround himself with the ceremonial trappings of royalty.[78] There is no mention of unction, but perhaps, as a Hispanic patriot, Isidore would wish to pass over such blasphemy. Leovigild occupies an ambiguous position in Visigothic historiography. Later writers condemned his Arianism but took quiet pride in his consolidation of the kingdom. This problem may well explain Isidore's reticence here.

This comes from the old practice in which those who attained to the priesthood and kingship were accustomed to be anointed hence Aaron was anointed by Moses" ("Nam sicut in baptismo peccatorum remissio datur, ita per unctionem sanctificatio spiritus adhibetur; et hoc de pristina disciplina, qua ungui in sacerdotium et in regnum solebant, ex quo et Aaron a Moyse unctus est").

It appears likely therefore that by Isidore's day at least one king had received unction at the hands of the church. It is possible that if Sisenand was the first Visigothic king to be anointed that this innovation was introduced by Isidore himself. If so, he would have been disappointed by its results. The history of Visgothic Spain shows that unction provided very little in the way of ecclesiastical control over monarchs or influence on nobles to respect the divinely sanctioned authority of the king. For unfortunately, while the ritual could only happen at the hands of the Church, the control over the monarchy that it placed in those hands was lost in the very process of anointing the king. An anointed king possessed at least as close, and arguably a closer, relationship with God than any churchman, something ambitious monarchs were not slow to exploit when it was convenient to do so.[79] Isidore's friend King Sisebut (612–21) had been happy to intervene in church affairs, and indeed lecture the religious on them. Later monarchs too, such as Chindaswinth, had no qualms in asserting their authority over the church and doing so in theological terms.

7 The Problem of Tyranny

Nevertheless, Isidore's philosophy of the state and his view that only a just ruler could be truly called a king could be seen to raise the threat of a legitimate uprising against a monarch judged to be the result of ruling badly, and his words were used for just that purpose. For example, in 1073 Otto of Nordheim used the doctrine of right rulership to justify his rebellion against Henry IV of Germany. The contemporary historian Bruno of Magdeburg directly attributes this doctrine to Isidore in his Saxonicum Bellum, so we see Isidore's philosophy seemingly operating in both the realms of theory and practice. Equally, Manegold of Lautenbach in his Ad Gebehardum Liber of c.1085 also deploys Isidore's argument from ius naturale that "king" is not the name of a nature, but of an office, to assert that Henry IV had sinned to the degree that he should be deposed.[80] Isidore's dictum, albeit in a garbled form, was also used in 1649 at the trial of King Charles I. One of his accusers, Judge John Bradshaw, after likening Charles to Caligula and Nero, concluded:

> Truly, sir, We have been told, Rex est dum bene regit, Tyrannus qui populum opprimit. And if so be that be the definition of a Tyrant, then see how you come short of it in your actions, whether the highest Tyrant, by that way of arbitrary government, and that you have sought to put, you were putting upon the people? Whether that was not as high an act of Tyranny as any of your predecessors were guilty of, nay many degrees beyond it?[81]

The notion that rulers could, and indeed, ought to be deposed if they fell short of certain standards has only gained in popularity since the 17th century, and Isidore's definition of rulership has provided powerful ammunition for its theoretical grounding. Isidore himself, however, would have been horrified that his work could be used in this way. Rather he was in agreement with Gregory the Great that, however wicked, each ruler had been set up by God and it was thus right to obey, not rebel against, him.[82] Tyrants could be identified, but they were to be endured, not deposed. A variety of reasons can be found for Isidore's advocacy of passive endurance of bad rulers. One is his own experience. Isidore had lived through a foreign invasion brought on by a civil war, lived through a further long civil war waged around Seville from 579–84, and witnessed the near outbreak of another after the accession of King Reccard in 589. Later in life he saw two further coups. All of this is likely to have convinced him that stability, even in an unjust form, was preferable to anarchy.

[82] Gregory the Great, Regula Pastoralis 3.4.

Theologically, too, Isidore was happy to accept the notion that tyrants are a flagellum Dei:

> Kings when they are good are a gift from God, but when they are bad, they are a product of a people's sin. For a people's worth determines the nature of their rulers as Job testified: He makes a hypocrite king because of the sins of the people. When God is angry the people receive such a ruler as their sins deserve.[83]

Isidore is even prepared to reverse his concern that bad kings corrupt their subjects to argue that "at times kings are even changed by the wickedness of their people and those who appeared good before they ruled become iniquitous when they receive their realm."[84] Even in this punishment Isidore, like Augustine before him,[85] divines God's mercy: "Humble servitude is better than arrogant freedom. For many are to be found who are set under sinful masters and freely serving God, men who though subject to their masters in the body are uplifted in their minds."[86] The good man knows that suffering in this world will lead to joy in the next.[87]

All of the threads of Isidore's political thought can be found coalescing in canon 75 of the Fourth Council of Toledo, over which he presided in 633.[88] The council was held some three years after the collapse of Swintila's reign and his replacement by Sisenand. Sisenand's supporters had been prepared to bribe the Frankish king Dagobert (629–34) to support their putsch—a highly risky matter given the strong dislike of the Franks in Spain[89]—and his coup seemingly provoked an attempt at secession in Andalusia and Extremadura led by one Iudila.[90] Swintila is a nebulous figure. He had himself displaced King Sisebut's young son Reccared II as king in 621 in dubious circumstances. He was nevertheless an effective monarch who ended the Byzantine occupation of parts of the Iberian Peninsula. Isidore praises him effusively during his reign,[91] but, given that he had been a good friend of King Sisebut, in reality he may have been no true ally of the usurper. After his fall Swintila was roundly denounced at the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633. This may simply have been the rhetoric of the day, done for the benefit of Sisenand, the new king, but could also suggest that Swintila had not been a friend of the church, still less compliant to its wishes. If this is the case, his reign may well have provoked Isidore to think hard about the relationship between church and state and perhaps stimulated his thoughts as expressed in the Sententiae, which he most likely wrote in 633 shortly after the Council.[92]

Canon 75 insists that Swintila, in horror at his crimes, had voluntarily surrendered the throne.[93] Regardless of the truth of the matter, the statement happily conforms with Isidore's doctrine that rulers are not to be overthrown by force. The need for loyalty to the king forms the first part of the canon. Its appeal is based not only on secular pragmatism—such solidarity will ensure the well-being of the nation—but also on religious sanction. Disloyalty and rebellion, it is argued, are sacrilege, as the oath of loyalty to the king was taken in God's name.[94] Rebels are directly likened to Judas and should suffer the worst of all possible religious penalties: anathema and excommunication. Two biblical exempla referring to the inviolate status of the Lord's anointed are adduced to strengthen the bishops' case, and a further one warns of the dangers of Divine wrath that will attend any such behaviour.[95] Looking to the future, the canon goes on to envisage a major role for the church as a kingmaker, stating that, on the death of the incumbent monarch, the "leaders of the people and their priests shall choose by joint counsel a successor to the kingdom."[96] The canon then outlines a vision of kingship which coincides perfectly with Isidore's writings on the subject:

Nor let any of you give sentence alone in capital or civil cases, but let the guilt of malefactors be made plain in open judgement through the consent of the people with their rulers. Rule gently with your people unmolested so that you may rule over them as much by mercy as severity. And while all such things are so preserved by the aid of God and your own pious moderation, let kings rejoice in their people and the people in their kings and God in both of them. But we make this declaration about future kings: if one of them, contrary to respect for the law, exercises his power cruelly over the people in an arrogant reign and right royal disdain amid outrages, crimes, and greed, let him be condemned as anathema by Christ the Lord, let him be separated from, and judged by, God for his presumption to work ill deeds and bring the kingdom to ruin.[97]

It is this threat that the council wished to emphasise.

As can be seen, all of Isidore's concerns about kingship are condensed in this canon. We see his insistence that rulers of whatever kind hold their power through divine dispensation and thus must not be overthrown. The threat of anathematisation of a wicked ruler significantly comes not from the Church on earth, but rather Christ in heaven, and it is in heaven too, not on earth, where such a monarch will be called to account. However, alongside this, we can see Isidore's concomitant belief that kings are but stewards of God, not rulers by virtue of their own person, and from this it follows that their rule should be just and open and, seemingly a particular concern of Isidore's, tempered with mercy. Moreover, there is also, in the formulation of how a king is to be elected, a wish that any monarch should command the broad consensus of the community as a whole. Still, rather than positing a "social contract" between ruler and ruled, we should see Isidore's state as one which has at its heart a "divine contract" made between God and the ruler. God has given the ruler a mandate and in return expects his steward to rule well over the people he has entrusted to him. While such a rule will require firmness at times, it must necessarily be conducted in a manner which furthers the common good, not the ruler's own benefit. The Church's role in such a state is to provide guidance and warnings to the ruler to ensure that he fulfils his part of the divine contract correctly.

8 Conclusion

Isidore's legacy in later political thought is often forgotten, but his writings formed the basis for the ideas expressed in the "Mirrors of Princes" throughout the Middle Ages and preserved many traditions that are now taken for granted. These include the notions that law and government should be open and for the benefit of all, that rulers should be selected through the broad consensus of their community, that they can be judged by criteria other than those of their own devising, that they should be answerable to the law, and that they are responsible for the acts of their appointees. Isidore is more than aware of the problem of the tyrant, and his writing eloquently poses Hamlet's question of what is nobler in the mind. It shows both of the Prince of Denmark's solutions have their strengths. While Isidore's own religious beliefs and political experiences led him to believe that the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune should be endured, his writings also helped lay the intellectual foundations for the arguments of those who wished to end them. It would be wrong to present Isidore as a profound political thinker—though he is not, as is sometimes asserted, simply a slavish follower of the sources he had read.[98] His most important contribution to political thought is to have kept alive the tradition of natural law which may well have died without its popularisation through his works, and thus helped create a climate where the rulers of society could be held to account for their deeds. It is a legacy for which we should be duly thankful.

CHAPTER 13

Confronting the Other: Isidore of Seville on Pagans, Romans, Barbarians, Heretics, and Jews

Raúl González Salinero

1 Introduction[1]

The Visigothic conversion to Catholicism, solemnly established at the Third Council of Toledo in 589, brought about a true societas fidelium Christi,[2] "a unitary body bound together by a common faith and ruled over by a divinely sanctioned head."[3] Similar to the Edict of Thessalonica (Cunctos populos) (380), after which the identity of the Roman was equated with that of the faithful Christian, in the "new" Visigothic state, ruled by a Catholic monarch submitted to the doctrines of the Catholic Church, all subjects would be defined by the status of fidelis.[4] Indeed, according to Isidore of Seville, "God has granted sovereignty to princes to rule over peoples,"[5] a donum which should be used to protect only "members of Christ," in other words, the fideles:

> It is clear that believing peoples are the limbs of Christ so that as long as they who have received this power rule well by it, they give a good return to God, who granted it to them.[6]

The bishops present at the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633 were under Isidore's direct influence and leadership, and they defended in the second canon the principle of the unity of the kingdom through one faith: one fides, one regnum (nec diuersa sit ultra in nobis ecclesiastica consuetudo, qui una fide continemur et regno). Therefore, infidelitas to God and infidelitas to the king, who kept a watch over the Church of God, were one and the same.[7]

The political theory that established the religious legitimacy of the Visigothic monarchy and identified the interests of the king, as guide and intercessor of his people before God, with the Church's doctrinal principles, quickly found its most elaborate expression in Isidore's writings.

Jacques Fontaine asserts that Isidore worked very hard to outline "un proyecto global de sociedad" ("a global social project") in which he tried to harmonize all the different components of the Visigothic kingdom. He established a direct correlation between the Gothic subject, the continuity of the patriotic Roman tradition, and the sacred character of a monarchy that ruled according to the doctrinal values of the Church: Patria Gothorum, romanitas, rex rectus and ciuitas Dei peregrinans.[8] The correlation between the Visigoths' cultural roots and Roman tradition was largely the result of the kingdom's affinity with the Catholic faith.[9] Isidore established a theology of power which assigned to the king the task of protecting the Church and forming a regnum Christi. This conception of rule did not derive from purely political speculation but out of the doctrinal struggle against all those outside the establishment.

Even if they could eventually be submitted to the same political authority, the one element that unified the individuals that embodied "the other" was their infidelitas. Pagans, heretics, and Jews were all viewed as stemming from the same source of evil, originating from the devil.[10] They posed a constant threat to the true faith, and therefore to the regnum Christi (Sent. 1.16).[11] None of these "errors" could be justified for Isidore:

> Those who turn from idolatry to Judaism or to heresy, turn, as the prophet says, from one evil to another and are not known to God as they cross over from the error of paganism to another error.[12]

Even though paganism and heresy preoccupied Isidore and the rest of the bishops of the Visigothic kingdom, after the conversion to Catholicism and the implementation of various measures that reduced the threat of heresy considerably (especially Arianism), the notion of the "perfidious" Jew slowly replaced pagans and heretics as "the other," embodying all of the elements that characterized the enemies of the regnum Christi.[13] One can clearly perceive this process in the different versions of Isidore's writings in the growing intensity with which he deploys the concept of the "other" sometimes viewed figuratively and on other occasions as a real threat.

2 Pagans

2.1 Theoretical Discourse: Antiquarian Prevention

Taking into account a considerable portion of the anti-pagan arguments found within the Patristic tradition, Isidore approached the problem of pagan religion from a perspective that is both encyclopedic and timeless. Indeed, with the exception of a few ambiguous, anachronistic references, his perspective was very far from the contemporary realities of his day.[14] The concept of superstitio acquired, as it did for all other Christian writers, a pejorative meaning as it related to the pernicious world of empty practices brought about by a false religion.[15] However, the definition of superstitio as "a superfluous or superimposed observance" and "senile with age" in the Etymologiae (8.3.6), suggests that Isidore wanted to convey the idea that superstitio applied more to practices alien to accepted Christian doctrine than to paganism itself.[16] Thus, it is not surprising to discover in his Sententiae a close relationship between pagans and heretics, who were both apparently incited by the devil (Sent. 1.16.14; Quaest. In Iob 8.2–3). This assumes that, in opposition to Christianity, idolatry originating in primitive religions and belonged to beliefs subject to barbarism. The word "pagan" thus came to denote, in general terms, all that belonged to the realm of superstition and unchristian ways.[17]

In the only surviving canon of the Third Council of Seville, celebrated under Isidore's rule between the years 619 and 624, preserved in the Juliana recension of the Hispana (and, with a few textual variations, among the Pseudoisidorian Decretals), it is specified that Jewish children who, through a fraudulent simulation, had escaped forced baptism,[18] remained "pagan" (sicque occulta ac nefaria simulatione natos suos paganos retienent). In other words, they lacked the grace of baptism and for this reason remained outside the Church, and consequently the individual, whether Jew or pagan, was immersed in barbarism and superstition.[19]

Isidore's interest in the origin and nature of the pagan gods originated both in his intellectual curiosity and his eagerness to register, within an encyclopedic context, the human character of some gods adored by virtue of the devil's instigation.[20] Isidore delved deeply in pagan literature, which he advised the majority of Christians not to read (Etym. 8.7; Sent. 3.13).[21] Now, mindful of the fact that ignorance is the mother of all evils and one of the nursing mothers of vice (Synon. 2.65),[22] Isidore was often prone to letting monks and priests read, with extreme caution, pagan authors.[23] In other instances, as in his monastic practices, Isidore asserts the opposite: "monks should not read books by pagan authors, for it is preferable to ignore their doctrines than to fall in the joke of their errors by own accord" (Reg. mon. 8).[24] Drawing inspiration from Augustine's Confessions, Isidore recognizes the accomplishments of classical philosophy[25] and pagan philosophers' cosmic knowledge, while he simultaneously reproaches them for their ingratitude to God, which was the result of the devil's influence[26]:

> The pagan philosophers as they did not seek God as they ought to have, fell into the hands of the rebel angels and the Devil set himself up as their mediator for Death, just as Christ has set himself up as our mediator for Life.[27]

According to Isidore, paganism was intimately connected with the practices of magic and divination, which could lead to the survival of demonic forces. In his Etymologies we find that pagan philosophers and poets are in the same category as prophetesses and magicians (Etym. 8.8–9). Their occultism and evil spells constantly preoccupied Isidore, who accordingly (Etym. 8.9.3)[28] advised Christians to be very vigilant:

> In all these the craft of demons has issued from a certain pestilential alliance of humans and evil angels. Hence all these things are to be avoided by a Christian, and entirely repudiated and condemned with every curse.[29]

2.2 Praxis: The Dying Embers

There are relatively few references to "popular religion" in Visigothic sources of the 7th century,[30] with the exception of a few which served, as in the case of the writings of Isidore of Seville, to expose an archaic image of ancestral practices which, from a moral standpoint, should be rejected outright.[31] Besides, not all religious and social traditions outside the norms of the Church should automatically be considered pagan, nor do the behaviours our sources describe as "superstitious" necessarily deserve the label of "pagan," as conferred on them by the Church authorities.[32] However, certain canons reveal the constant concern that some superstitious practices or remnants of paganism would surface in the ecclesiastical hierarchy of the Visigothic Church, over which Isidore exercised considerable authority.

The bishops gathered at the Third Council of Toledo (589) had already realized that the sacrilege of idolatry (idolatriae sacrilegium) was widely spread throughout Gaul and Hispania; it urged, in collaboration with local judges (iudices territoriorum), its investigation in all the dioceses so that, once detected, it could be properly punished (canon 16).[33] In one of the first Councils led by Isidore of Seville (the aforementioned Third Council of Seville), Bishop Martianus of Astigi (Ecija) was dismissed on the grounds of a false accusation, including a visit to a fortune-teller, Simplicia, who was asked to provide an omen on his own life and that of the king.[34] Although the minutes of the Third Council of Seville are not available in their entirety (only the above-mentioned canon), the case is known because of an exculpatory verdict which was made years later at the Sixth Council of Toledo (638) after the witnesses had withdrawn their testimony relating to the specific content of the consultation with the fortune-teller and not to the act of requesting her services. All this implied an implicit recognition on the part of the bishops in the fortune-teller's ability.[35] In the final stages of Isidore's episcopacy, the Fourth Council of Toledo (633) notes that bishops, priests, and deacons often visited "warlocks, diviners, prophets, or the sort of soothesayers who cast lots or others who profess a similar art" [magos aut haruspices aut hariolos, aut certe augures uel sortilegos uel eos qui profitentur artem aliquam] (canon 29).[36] This index of characters devoted to occultism seems to have been taken from the Etymologiae (8.9), yet this is not necessarily a reason for doubting that it may reflect contemporary beliefs and practices.[37] Isidore presided over this council, and he probably participated actively in generating its proceedings. The use of theoretical terminology to describe those dedicated to the art of divination and magic does not mean that they were not a tangible presence in the Visigothic kingdom. The definition taken from the Etymologies constituted a basis for understanding, describing, prohibiting, and punishing the activities mentioned in the canon. Some Christians (including the ecclesiastical hierarchy) celebrated, according to the deviant traditions of the pagans (propter eorum gentilium aguntur), the Kalends of January, singing the alleluia and deliberately ignoring the fast the Church established on that date so that it would not be desecrated by any pagan practice (canon 11).[38] Isidore himself had already alluded to this fact in his De ecclesiasticis officiis:

> The church established the fast on the Kalends of January because of the errors of the pagans .... The Fathers of the Church seeing that the greater part of the human race were in thrall on that day to sacrilege or extravagance, determined that there be a public fast in all churches across the world so that men could see the depths of their depravity and the necessity of fasting in every church to atone for their sins.[39]

3 Romans, Byzantines, and Barbarians

3.1 Theoretical Discourse: Defense of the Visigothic Identity

Born into a family from Cartagena that was forced to immigrate to the province of Baetica, in southern Spain, following the landing of Byzantine troops in 552, Isidore could thus have cultivated a hostile attitude to the Byzantines from a very early age, although it is impossible to clearly verify this theory in Isidore's writings, despite the opinion of modern historiography.[40] Keeping in mind that Christian romanitas was, in a sense, still present in the Byzantine Empire, Isidore was inclined to its legitimacy and greatness, at least from a theoretical perspective (Etym. 15.1.42).[41] The ideological image that Isidore initially conceived of Byzantium oscillated between that of Leovigild, whose most significant act was the adoption of imperial-style ceremony in the Visigothic court,[42] and the disillusion, from an ecclesiastical perspective, of his brother Leander, who had firsthand experience dealing with Byzantine diplomats.[43] On some occasions, Isidore seems to admire the cultural model of the Byzantine court or feels compelled to adopt its ideological roots, while on others he showed a profound distrust for the Byzantines in the political and religious sphere, denouncing acrimoniously the Romana insolentia (Hist. Goth. 54.15–16).

Byzantine Spania was in direct confrontation with the Visigoths, who ruled over the rest of the Iberian Peninsula (the Suevic kingdom of northwest Spain no longer existed as a separate political entity in Isidore's day). As a result, Isidore of Seville established a new Hispano-Gothic ideology which would, without renouncing Roman heritage and tradition, annul any justification for the Byzantine presence in the south of Spain.[44] In order to attain this goal it was necessary, first of all, to banish from descriptions of the Visigoths the use of the word "barbarian", a term that had been used to refer to the Visigoths since their earliest appearance in written sources, usually in direct contrast to the Romans.

In his historical writings Isidore defended the religious and political legitimacy of the Visigoths, deliberately ignoring their Arian past, and denigrated other barbaric populations that were militarily weaker or deviated from the true Catholic faith.[45] The concept of "barbaric" became an apologetic instrument for the Goths. In fact, in his Historiae, all adversaries of the Goths (save for the Byzantine Empire, evidently) would be considered barbaric: the Sueves, Vandals, and Alans were explicitly described as such (12; 22; 68), and, implicitly, so were the Huns, Persians, Franks, and Basques (27–29; 36; 41–42; 54; 59; and 63). The defense of the ciuilitas, naturally associated with Nicene Christianity,[46] was from that point on the responsibility of both Romans and Visigoths.[47] However, the "nationalist" exaltation of the Gothic people demanded that Isidore adapt or even devalue the Roman myth in relation to a new political reality: as shown with the consolidation of Visigothic power in Hispania.[48] In any case, the Rome that Isidore evokes in his Laus Hispaniae emanates from Western Latinity, not Eastern Rome.[49] It was in this way that the Visigoths had converted themselves into the heirs and continuators of true romanitas, thus removing any ideological claims to be such which emanated from the Byzantine world.

3.2 Praxis: A Providential Kingdom

The possibility of cooperation among Catholics to combat Arian heresy could have spawned in Isidore a better opinion about the Byzantines.[50] However, Jacques Fontaine has suggested that Byzantine rule over some dioceses located in the ecclesiastical province of Baetica, still under Isidore's authority, would have hindered any sort of attempt to reach an understanding with imperial forces, including in the religious realm.[51] In fact, the "rootlessness" of some dioceses located in Byzantine territory could have greatly damaged, according to the author, the metropolitan authority of Seville.[52] Because there were no doctrinal frictions between the two sides of the territorial conflict, communication between dioceses was not affected. There is even evidence of collaboration between the dioceses under Byzantine rule and those of the Spanish-Visigothic Church after the kingdom's official conversion to Catholicism.[53]

Nevertheless, the Byzantine occupation of the southeast of the Iberian Peninsula until the reign of Suinthila probably seemed to Isidore a momentary frustration of providential plans in favor of Visigothic power in Hispania. However, successful military campaigns against the milites romani by the dux (and future king) Suinthila during the reign of Sisebut (Hist. Goth. 47; 61–62; Chron., 414–17)[54] prepared the way for the final conquest, around the year 625, of the few Byzantine territories in the Iberian Peninsula. As happened with the famous victories over the Franks in Septimania (Hist. Goth. 41; 54),[55] Isidore took pleasure in narrating the exploits of the Visigoth monarchs and in pointing out that it was Suinthila who managed to assert Visigothic rule over a unified and independent Hispania.[56] It is at this moment that Isidore assigned the term imperium to the power of the Goths (Hist. Goth. 65.10–12) and the title of princeps populorum to the virtuous Gothic monarch (Hist. Goth. 64.1–11).[57] According to Isidore, none of their victories over the powerful Byzantine Empire would have been possible without divine help.[58] M.R. Valverde Castro asserts that > the divine origins of royal power lay at the heart of his political thought. We encounter a perfect distillation of this idea in the phrase gratia divina which Isidore uses to refer to the accession of Suintilia. It is an expression which concisely expresses the concept that royal power is a result of divine favor: that a monarch's kingdom is given to him by God's grace.[59]

For Isidore of Seville there was no doubt that the Goths, defenders of the true faith, had replaced the Romans. In fact, his apologetical vision led him to believe that only the Visigothic kingdom could offer the Church the necessary conditions for its providential progress; whereas the Byzantine Empire, a nest of heresies (Etym. 8.5), had recently been sympathetic towards heterodox doctrines. It was for this reason that the emperor had lost his former function as rector ecclesiae.[60] There is no question that Isidore had in mind the "Three Chapters Controversy" (*c.*544)[61] that emerged in the mid-6th century because of Emperor Justinian's failed attempt to re-establish, through an edict, ecclesiastical unity with the Monophysites. The writings of three theologians (Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibbas of Edessa) were condemned at the Second Council of Constantinople (the Fifth Ecumenical Council, held in 553). This had repercussions in Hispania.[62]

Isidore mentions an imperial rescript against bishops from the region of Illyrium and Africa, who had refused to condemn the Three Chapters (De vir. ill. 18).[63] The orthodoxy of the Visigoth monarchs, by contrast, was beyond suspicion.[64] At the Fourth Council of Toledo, inspired and presided over by Isidore of Seville in 633, the trust that bishops had placed in monarchs to defend the one true faith was permanently sealed[65]:

> We ask with due humility that you, our present King [i.e. Sisenand], and the future kings of the ages to come be moderate and kindly towards those who are your subjects, that you rule with justice and piety the peoples entrusted to you by God, that you respond to Christ who has given you these things by ruling with a humble heart and devotion to good deeds.[66]

4 Heretics

4.1 Theoretical Discourse: The Loss of Ecclesial Unity

Given that the error of heresy emerged from incorrect interpretation of the Scriptures (Sent. 1.16.8; 3.12.2–4; Quaest. in Exod. 36), Isidore took it upon himself to present, with a clear pedagogical intention, a catalog of the main deviations that had developed through time from the doctrinal core of Christianity and Judaism. In order to carry out this task Isidore followed the writings of Augustine and Gregory the Great very closely. This detailed list would impede the clergy from interpreting the Scriptures wrongly, and in turn would dispel any dangers brought about by heretics (Sent. 1.16.13–14; De eccl. off. 2.23; Alleg.

En ese esquema, la clerecía participa junto al rey de la conducción de ese pueblo, en una postura que la sitúa paradójicamente por debajo y por encima de él."

[66] "[…] Te quoque praesentem regem [Sisenandus] futurosque aetatum sequentium principes humilitate qua debemus deposcimus ut moderati et mites erga subiectos exsistentes cum iustitia et pietate populos a Deo uobis creditos regatis, bonamque uicissitudinem, qui uso constituit, largitori Christo respondeatis regnantes in humilitate cordis cum studio bonae actionis […]," IV Toledo, 75.

127; Quaest. in Gen. 4.6–7).[67] Isidore thought that in order to combat heresy effectively, it was convenient only to recognize the dogmas on which heresies were based (Etym. 8.3.7), because even within the Church[68] faithful Christians were not exempt from falling prey to its pernicious traps:

> […] These heresies, although they disagree with each other, differing among themselves in many errors, nevertheless conspire with a common name against the Church of God. But also, whoever understands the Holy Scriptures otherwise than the meaning of the Holy Spirit, by whom they were written, can, even if he does not depart from the Church, be called a heretic.[69]

While heresies sowed discord among the Church, Isidore did not deem them a danger in themselves as they could provide valuable proof in favor of the one true faith and strengthen the orthodox doctrine of the Catholic Church throughout the world (pro eo quod universaliter per omnem sit mundum diffusa, Sent. 1.16.5). Isidore expressed his views as follows:

> The Church has grown in doctrine because of the depravity of heresy. Previously it flourished with but a simple faith. With the rise of heretics doctors of the Faith grew up and because of the sharpness of these heresies church leaders arose. For now we see a brighter assertion of the Truth, whenever some dissent from it is found.[70]

Isidore compared mosquitos from the third biblical plague of Egypt with the numerous heretics who, with their vexing "bites," are ever unrelenting in their attacks on the faith of true Christians (Quaest. in Exod. 14.4–6, PL 83, 292–93). In his commentary, Leviticus-style, he compares heresy (also associated with Judaism) with leprosy. He adds that it had an off-white color typical of the illness and symbolic of those heretics who, similar to those adhering to the doctrines of Pelagianism and Novatianism, falsely proclaimed their purity (Quaest. in Lev. 11.12, PL 83, 329). For this very reason, priests especially should avoid mixing with these "neighbours" and "mercenaries," allusions to heretics (falsely calling themselves Christians) and Jews (carnal servants of the Law of Moses) (Quest. in Vet. Test.: in Lev. 12.13–14, PL 83, 332).[71]

[68] Referring to the wicked Elihu from the book of Job, Isidore cautions in his Prooemia in libros Veteris et Noui Testamenti 32 (PL 83, 163) against arrogant preachers who, from within the Church, plot against her.

[69] "Haec sunt haereses aduersus catholicam fidem exortae, et ab Apostolis et a sanctis Patribus uel Conciliis praedamnatae: quae dum in se multis erroribus diuisae inuicem sibi dissentiant, communi tamen nomine aduersus Ecclesiam Dei conspirant. Sed et quicumque aliter Scripturam sanctam intellegit quam sensus Spiritus sancti flagitat, a quo conscripta est, licet de Ecclesia non recesserit, tamen haereticus appellari potest," Isidore, Etymologiae 8.5.70, trans. Barney et al., 178.

[70] "Causa prauitatis haereticae doctrinis est propagata Ecclesia; nam antea simplici tantum fide uigebat. Haereticorum igitur occasione propagati sunt doctores in fide, et per acumina haeresum Ecclesiae magistri creuerunt. Nam tunc clarius manifestatur ueritatis assertio, quando patuerit quaelibet dissensio," Isidore, Sententiae 1.16.5.

In any case, the wisdom and patience of the Church provided a common front against the attacks of heretics and pagans (Sent. 1.16.2 and 4).[72] Its Catholicity denoted an evident superiority in regards to the different "small heretical groups" (conuenticula haereticorum),[73] even though it could deteriorate very seriously given its enemies' combined efforts to upset it: "those who are divided against one another are found at times to be united in their opposition to the Church," (qui inuicem diuisi sunt, in aduersitate Ecclesiae simul existunt uni Sent. 1.16.10; cf. Etym. 8.5.70).[74] The greatest threat the Church faced from heresy was precisely its capacity to break ecclesiastical unity: "The heretics learn their lies with great zeal and struggle mightily not to come into the unity of the Church."[75]

Isidore de Seville was convinced that the only way to establish the celestial Jerusalem was through the peace and unity within the Church and establishing true doctrine: "there, when all hostility has been overwhelmed, one will possess peace, which is Christ, by gazing upon him face to face" (Etym. 8.1.6).[76] The synthesis and interpretation of Isidore's stance against heresy, manifest in his eighth book of the Etymologiae, can be rightfully summarized in the words of Angelo Valastro Canale:

> Heresy, the daughter of pride threatened the foundations of Christian unity, a unity which in the eyes of Isidore, was both religious and political at the same time. Heresy thus ought to be extirpated in order to guarantee the building of the Church Universal, in other words to guarantee the

Thus, for Isidore, without orthodoxy being imposed and defended by the Church against the disunity that heresy sought there was no possibility of establishing political and religious stability in the Visigothic kingdom.

4.2 Praxis: Averted Threats

According to our sources, it does not seem that Isidore had to contend with many heretical movements during his time as head of the bishopric of Seville. While we can state that Arianism had ceased to be an urgent problem for the Church during the period that Isidore was writing his most important works, there are some indications that he could have participated in the confrontations which took place between Catholics and Arians shortly after the Third Council of Toledo (589). At least, this is what Bishop Taio of Zaragoza could have tried to convey when he stated that Isidore "expelled the dirt of the Arian heresy from all over Hispania, persecuting it with the world of God."[77] Furthermore, the actions carried out by Isidore during a synod against a so-called Sintharius, recorded in a letter from Braulio of Zaragoza, may have been related to the struggle to eradicate Arian heresy from the kingdom which had recently converted to Catholicism.[78] In any case, it is highly probable that Isidore's behavior took place in a clearly anti-heretical context:

> I ask you to use your influence with your son and lord, the king, to have to me right away the minutes of the council in which Sintharius was thoroughly cooked, even if not completely purified, with the fire of your inquisition. I have already asked his highness for this, since I am very much in need of it to investigate the truth in the council [...].[79]

Barlow, Iberian Fathers, Volume 2: Braulio of Saragosa, Fructuosus of Braga (Washington, DC: 1969), 17–18.

In the twelfth canon of the Second Council of Seville, over which Isidore presided in 619, we find a description of the conversion to Catholicism of a Syrian bishop ex haerese Acephalorum who defended, so it seemed, a Monophysite theology. As described in the canon, this acephalous heresy (literally meaning "without a head," given that it belonged to one of the Monophysite communities completely separated from all Christian patriarchates) "negated the existence of two natures in Christ and affirmed that deity could suffer."[80]

The mystery of Christ's Incarnation had divided the early Church since the councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451). The Catholic Church's official doctrine, sanctioned by Pope Leo I, recognized two indissoluble natures in the person of Christ. However, not all bishops adhered to this theological interpretation and maintained that there could only be one nature in Christ ("Monophysitism," from mono "one," and physis, "nature"). For this reason, it was impossible to admit the principle of divine impassivity.[81] Given that this controversy had political and social ramifications, the Emperor Justinian (527–65) attempted to settle the issue by promoting the concept of Christ's Monothelitism (from thelema, "will") which in the end did not satisfy either of two opposing sides. The Catholic doctrine was then forcibly imposed in the East, leading to the exile of many bishops.[82] It is probable that the difficulties that the Monophysites faced motivated the Syrian bishop known as Gregory, who, according to Braulio of Zaragoza,[83] went into (forced or voluntary) exile and later appeared before the Second Council of Seville in 619.[84] It is not unlikely that the matter was taken before the council because the bishops were concerned that this heretic could confuse the faithful Christians of Baetica.[85] From the information found in the canon we deduce that the Syrian priest did not accept the arguments of the Baetican bishops and refused to admit that Christ had two natures, while maintaining that the deity was capable of suffering. However, under constant pressure he capitulated and retracted (gratia diuina eductus) his error before all the bishops present at the synod:

[80] In his Chronica 385, Isidore mentioned the appearance in the East of a heresy called acephalous ("without a head") which was in direct opposition with the decisions of the Council of Chalcedon. He described the heresy as a "pest" and suggested that even in his own day (hactenus) Christianity still suffered from it. A similar explanation with a brief description on the Monophysite Christology ("unam in eius persona naturam praedicant") appears in Etymologiae 8.5.66. See Fontaine, "Isidoro de Sevilla frente a la España bizantina," 34–35. According to Wood, Politics of Identity, 215, "Isidore's depiction of the emperors as supporting the Acefali and opposing Chalcedon showed that the Romans were heretics, undermined their claim to be defenders of orthodoxy, and suggested that their actions had led to the emergence of further heresies."

Without discarding the possibility that he had come directly

> By confronting him with the evidence of our Lord Jesus Christ's incarnation and reading to him the views of the Holy Fathers, we then with every exhortation and with due priestly modesty invited him to embrace the rectitude of the True Faith. By such wholesome advice after stubbornly rejecting communion in many lengthy struggles, finally he was enlightened by Divine Grace and abjured his heresy, while standing in the midst of us, and confessed that there are two natures and one person in our one and same Lord Jesus Christ, professing that His divine nature was impassible and that only in His human nature did He endure the afflictions of suffering and the cross.[86]

Isidore deemed it convenient to add at the end of the council's proceedings, as the thirteenth canon, a brief theological treatise (not exempt from doctrinal errors itself) in which he defended the double nature of Christ as human and divine.[87] This could potentially have served as a reminder of the recent case of

In the Renotatio librorum domini Isidori Braulio of Zaragoza praised Isidore, describing the episode as follows: "with what a flood of eloquence, with what barbs of Divine Scriptures and proofs from the Fathers he confounded the heresy of the Acephalites, is revealed in the acts of the Council which met under his leadership at Seville, in which he established the Catholic truth against Gregory, the leader of the said heresy," trans. the Syrian heretic and as a manual for future conversions from error to Catholicism.

It did not matter that the bishops, with Isidore as their leader, twisted (indubitably out of ignorance) the doctrine of the Acephali, a Monophysite group that continued to exist, according to Anastasius of Sinai and George of Pisidia, as a Monophysite group in the 7th century. The bishops at the Second Council of Seville say that the Syrian bishop denied the Proprietas of the two natures in Christ, implying that after the union each nature had a different Proprietas, and that as such he defended deitas passibilis (Theopaschism), when in fact the Monophysite doctrine acknowledged the deitas non passibilis. The canon from the Seville council bears witness to the fact that the bishops interpreted this heretical doctrine incorrectly, possibly a sign of the distinctiveness of Western Christianity at the time.[88] However, none of the bishops was interested in shedding light on the heretical doctrine of the Syrian priest. It was sufficient to denounce the danger brought about by those situated outside orthodoxy, the perverse "other." L.S.B. MacCoull states, in relation to this particular incident: "The Syrian, doubly caught between the fallout of the Persian-Byzantine and Visigothic-Byzantine wars, is being represented as 'the other' whose terminology came from a world the westerners did not understand [...]."[89] Above all, Isidore's most important concern was with producing some doctrinal statement (be it intelligible or not) which placed the Syrian outside orthodoxy as defined by the Church.

5.1 Theoretical Discourse: The Anti-Jewish Controversy

Following the Patristic tradition of the Adversus Iudaeos genre, Isidore incorporated the main themes he had used to shape his anti-Jewish arguments in his most important works (Etymologiae, Sententiarum libri, Allegoriae quaedam sanctae Scripturae, Quaestiones in Vetus Testamentum) and wrote, at the request of his sister Florentina, an exegetic text directed specifically against the Jewish religion, entitled De fide catholica ex ueteri et nouo testamento contra Iudaeos.[90] In the first book he stated that the Jews' hardness of heart was manifested in their denial of Jesus as the Messiah, and their reluctance to follow Christian dogmas, which he claimed was mentioned in the Old Testament. The second book addressed the hereditary condemnation of the Jews, a result of their obstinate and ignominious rejection of Jesus as well as the repeal of the Jewish Law for the New Law.[91] Even though it has often been pointed out that this work lacks originality because of its similarities to biblical testimonia (as with the Ad Quirinum of Cyprian),[92] it contains long exegetic passages written in a typically Isidorian style.[93] Furthermore,[94] there are scholars who consider these writings an attempt to attract the Jews to Christianity[95] and argue that Isidore intended to present a model of the Christian message in order to convert the Jews through persuasion.[96] It has even been suggested, within the context of the forced conversions initiated by King Sisebut in 616, that Isidore was motivated by pastoral considerations, presupposing that Isidore would have tried to convince and instruct those Jews who had recently received baptism.[97] Although in most cases the author refers to the Jews in the third person (agnoscant Iudaei, respondeant Iudaei),[98] on other occasions he uses the imperative and addresses them using the second-person plural.[99] However, this could perhaps be interpreted "as literary recourse to enliven the expositio."[100] Besides, we must keep in mind that if this work was written between 614 and 615,[101] it was before Sisebut's general decree of forced conversions (in the year 616), and, as such, it could not have been designed to teach Jewish converts. At the same time, it would be strange for Isidore to ignore Sisebut's decree, whose specific structure was not consistent with the hypothetical pastoral intention.[102] Isidore's De fide catholica contra Iudaeos was eminently controversial.[103] Its author manifests a clear "catechetical" intention, as he intended to indoctrinate and strengthen his readers' faith and prove "the ignorance of the unfaithful Jews" (infidelium Iudaeorum imperitiam probet).[104] This work could even be considered an instructional charter for the clergy, especially if we keep in mind

Isidore's constant preoccupation with their training.[105] Despite the fact that it did not reflect contemporary reality,[106] the distorted image of the Jews that the bishop of Seville presents in his works was intended to create, both in the clergy and in their congregations, a negative predisposition towards the beliefs and customs of the Jewish religion.

For instance, Isidore viewed circumcision as a distinctive sign devoid of any salvific value, while baptism (or spiritual circumcision) cleansed all sin and offered eternal salvation to the Christians.[107] When he refers to the Sabbat he even goes so far as to accuse the Jews of appropriating the name "Saturday," as they did not consider it a spiritual rest. The true sabbatical rest was the one affecting the soul and not the one the Hebrews observed, which was bereft of any justification (De fide 2.15.1–2).[108] So discredited was this precept in Isidore's eyes that he attacked it as aggressively as possible: "The idle festival of the Jews [the sabbath] is spent in extravagance, drunkenness, and carousing, all giving themselves over to lust, and to enjoyment of the earthly life, serving the stomach and sex."[109] Isidore followed the same approach and tried to undercut the religious value of other Jewish festivities, despite the fact that he did not speak Hebrew and possessed a very deficient knowledge of Judaic practices and beliefs. For this reason, his information is always imprecise and superficial, as he often made mistakes with regards to the exact date of these festivities. Nevertheless, his distorted knowledge was more than sufficient to scorn the Jews vehemently.[110] Maintaining a consistent line of reasoning, Isidore attacks the

> The Jews who with their cursed incredulity deny Christ, the Son of God, impious and hard of heart they do not believe the ancient prophets and are closed to new developments. They prefer to ignore Christ's coming rather than know Him, to deny it rather than believe in it.[113]

Said incredulity allowed him to denounce the real intention of the Jewish people, which was none other than their anxious wait for the Antichrist, to whose lineage they belonged: "In times of the antichrist, the Synagogue will treat the Church even more mercilessly than how it did during the first coming of the Saviour."[114]

That same Synagogue (related to the Dalilah from the biblical text), corrupted by the devil and seduced by the unrelenting lustfulness of the flesh (Alleg. 40, PL 83, 108),[115] had refused to accept Christ and for this reason was the culprit that triggered God's abandonment of the Jewish people and their dispersal throughout the gentile nations who had responded affirmatively to the call of the Lord (De fide 1.27 and 31; 2.1–13).[116] Keeping in mind the argument from the

Ecclesia ex gentibus congregata (De fide 2.8),[117] Isidore accepted the Augustinian idea according to which, with the return of Christ and the establishment of the new allegiance, the Jews had no other purpose in the story of salvation than to be a witness to the Christian truth (De fide 2.12; Quaest. in Gen. 6.16–18, PL 83, 226).[118] Following Patristic tradition, Isidore was convinced that the Jews' conversion would only take place, eschatologically, at the end of time (De fide 2.4.1; 2.5.1–9; Quaest. in Gen. 6.16, PL 83, 226).[119] Isidore observed that the Jews continued to maintain their incredulity (De fide 2.5.1; 2.6.2) and that their spiritual blindness hindered their capacity to understand the truth and accept the true faith (De fide 2.5.4–5).[120]

Similar to the way in which Isidore placed Judaism among the heresies, he placed the Jews, because of their rejection of Christ, at the same level as heretics; in other words, outside the Church of God (De fide 2.2.8).[121] Isidore thought that one must not show them mercy (non est indulgendum eis) (De fide 2.22.1). Forgiveness of sins can only be attained through Catholic baptism (De fide 2.24.1–2) and an authentic conversion (De fide 2.5.1).[122] The next section examines the extent to which these doctrinal principles guided Isidore as he faced the reality of forced conversions under Sisebut.

5.2 Praxis: Forced Conversions

Isidore affirmed in his Etymologiae that "during the fourth and fifth year of the most religious ruler Sisebut the Jews in Spain convert to Christianity" (V.39.42),[123] and, even more explicitly, he adds in his Historia rerum gothorum suevorum et vandalorum:

> At the beginning of his reign he [Sisebut] led the Jews to the Christian faith and had indeed an ardent zeal, but not in accordance with wisdom, for he forced them by power when he should have roused them by the doctrine of faith. But, as it is written, "either at a favorable opportunity or by truth Christ should be preached. [cf. Phil. 1:18]."[124]

Years later, during the Fourth Council of Toledo, over which he presided, Isidore stated his opposition to the use of force to compel Jews to convert to Catholicism:[125]

> On the Jews, however, thus did the Holy Synod order, that no one should henceforth be forced to believe [...] such men should not be saved unwillingly but willingly, in order that the procedure of justice should be complete [...] They should be persuaded to convert, therefore, of their own free choice, rather than forced by violence [...] (c. 57).[126]

However, in the second part of this canon the bishops adopted a very different position with respect to the Jews who returned to their religion after having received Catholic baptism:

> [...] Those, however, who were formerly forced to come to Christianity (as was done in the days of the most religious prince Sisebut), since it is clear that they have been associated in the divine sacraments, received the grace of baptism, were anointed with chrism, and partook of the body and blood of the Lord, it is proper that they should be forced to keep the faith even though they had undertaken it under duress, lest the name of > the Lord be blasphemed and the faith they undertaken be treated as vile and contemptible. (c. 57)[127]

José Orlandis asserts that "Theological Realism" meant that forced baptisms had to be considered legitimate; otherwise, their validity would be jeopardized.[128] Besides, rejecting this sacrament was considered perjury, as it was believed to be a betrayal of the solemn oath taken during baptism.[129] Be that as it may, it does not seem that the bishops at the Fourth Council of Toledo were willing to stop forced conversions, whether they went against the civil or canonical code. At least this is the impression obtained from other canons that address the Jewish problem: those Jews who had reverted to their old practices must return to the Christian religion, even if it meant they had to be brought back by force (canon 59); if they are accused of apostasy then they must endure the punishments for this crime (canons 59 and 61); and mixed marriages are forbidden (unless the unfaithful—i.e. Jewish—party converts to Christianity), and the children from such unions must receive Catholic baptism and be educated in the Christian faith (canon 63). Such rulings did not, however, constitute a definitive solution to the Jewish "problem" that confronted the Visigothic church and state.[130]

Even if it is true that Isidore did not think that the method of forced conversion was the most effective means of dealing with the Jews, in no way did he question its results. The truth is that the politics of forced conversions promoted by Sisebut in the 610s draw on the approval and collaboration of Isidore and the ecclesiastical hierarchy of the kingdom.[131] The only extant canon of the Third Council of Seville (presided over by Isidore, as we already know) constitutes irrefutable proof of this fact.[132] Indeed, in this decree, bishops forced Jews to baptize their children, denouncing and prohibiting their common practice of substituting other children for their own in the baptismal ceremony[133]:

> We have learnt that certain Jews who have recently been called to the faith of Christ have, in the dishonesty of their perfidy have presented other children in place of their own before the holy, sacred font of baptism in order to wash these, in place of their own children in a further baptism, thus by this hidden and vile pretence they keep their children pagans. Truly they were all from the beginning perjured by their innate perfidy and never of the Faith! It behooves us to be wise to their deceitful schemes and trickery. For if some of the ancient fathers exercised such care concerning those of the Jews who had come to the grace of Christ by their own free will to prove their faith long before they were baptised, how much more should we be concerned about those who are called to the prize of faith not by a genuine conservation of their mind but solely by royal authority? For Sisebut the most loyal of God's servants and most victorious of princes amid all the concerns of his kingdom being mindful of the fathers' sayings that many good things must be set before the unwilling and knowing that he would have to give an account to God for those whom Christ had entrusted to his rule, preferred to lead even the unwilling to the Truth rather than that they persist in their ancient innate perfidy […] therefore of one accord we have decreed the following against these stubbornly impious souls that in both countryside and towns, both > presbyters and clerks should take care with them lest those of them who have not been baptised disguise their ancient errors.[134]

Isidore did not disapprove of coercive procedures. The use of force was justified when it was used to attain a higher purpose, as in the case of the king having to resort to violence to maintain, at all costs, ecclesiastical discipline (Sent. 3.51.5), or as in those other cases when it was necessary to force the people (even employing terror, if it was required) to obey the laws and avoid negative behavior (Sent. 3.47.1). It was only a small step from this to justifying forced conversions of the Jews.[135] We must not forget that Isidore does not exclude the role of divine coercion in leading a sinner to salvation:

> God brings fear to men in many ways so that, though tardily, they might convert and so feel all the more shame that their return to Him took so long. At times he alarms some with threats, at times some with blows, at times some with revelations so that those who disdain to convert of their own free will be set aright after being confounded by terror.[136]

The problem of crypto-Judaism convinced Isidore once and for all of the need to use persuasion as the only means to bring the Jews into the Christian faith,[137] even if it stood in direct opposition with his conviction of the inability to defeat, through reason, the hardness and stubbornness of the Jewish people.[138] Finally, it is possible that Pope Gregory the Great's opinion on this matter had influenced Isidore.[139] He believed that reasoning with the Jews to attract them to Christianity was more convenient than using force, since it only resulted in fake conversions, which would carry with them the desire to return to the previous religion and thus lead to even greater harm.[140]

Si enim illi antiqui Patres de his qui ex Iudaeis sponte sua ad Christi gratiam ueniebant, tantam sollicitudinis curam gesserunt, ut fides eorum ante baptismum multis temporibus probaretur, quanto magis de his quos non propria mentis conuersio sed sola regalis auctoritas ad fidei praemium prouocabat? Namque fidelissimus Deo Sisebutus ac uictoriosissimus princeps inter cunctas reipublicae suae curas memor Patrum dictis, quam multa bona praestantur inuitis sciens, super Deo se debere rationem de his quos Christus suo deputauit regimini istos etiam nolentes ueritatem perducere quam in uetustate inolitae perfidiae perdurare [...] idcirco contra indeuotos et pertinaces animos hoc in commune decernimus, ut siue in parrociis seu in urbibus tam presbyteri quam clerici peruigilem pro eis sollicitudinem gerant, ne qui ex his sine perceptione lauacri in errorem pristinum lateant," III Seville, 10.

[136] "Multis modis terret Deus homines, ut uel sero conuertantur, atque exinde magis erubescant, quod tandiu exspectati sunt ut redirent. Nam nunc minis, nunc plagis, nunc reuelationibus quosdam concutit, ut qui uoluntate conuerti despiciunt, commoti terroribus corrigantur," Isidore, Sententiae 2.7.8.

6 Conclusion

When the Visigoths converted to Catholicism in 589 the association between fides and regnum became permanently sealed. In the same way that the fides catholica determined a subject's social and legal status under Visigothic rule, infidelitas forbade an individual from belonging to the regnum Christi. Isidore used the concept of orthodoxy to delineate the ideological boundaries outside of which the "other" was placed, whether pagan, Byzantine, barbarian, heretic, or Jew. Marginally present in civil society and alienated both politically and religiously, they were all regarded as enemies of a state which had been instituted by divine right. The "other" was outside the parameters within which Isidore of Seville defined the new Visigothic kingdom: a Gothic fatherland, a repository of Roman cultural heritage under the protection of the divine providence and the doctrines of the Catholic Church.

PART 3

Transmission and Reception of Isidore's Work and Thought

CHAPTER 14

Isidore of Seville's Early Influence and Dissemination (636–711)

Mark Lewis Tizzoni

1 Introduction

Within a few decades of his death, certain of Isidore's works were disseminated rapidly, and knowledge of his life was spread throughout Spain and beyond. This chapter examines the immediate reception of Isidore, from the author's death in 636 to the fall of the Visigothic kingdom to Muslim armies in 711. Isidore's legacy was, at its very start, both human and intellectual: Isidore left behind not only his literary works but his students and followers. His legacy was born not only from his own efforts but from the efforts of the Iberian intellectuals who followed him. These intellectuals, some known to Isidore and others farther removed, received his thought and employed it in their own works, thus serving to transmit his works and reputation rapidly.

Until recently, the study of Isidore's legacy has been largely the purview of Spanish and French scholarship. As is generally the case with Isidorian studies, the work of Jacques Fontaine provides a good starting point. Fontaine provides a brief overview of Isidore's immediate legacy in the epilogue to his Isidore de Séville: Genèse et originalité de la culture hispanique au temps des Wisigoths (Turnhout: 2000).[1] A detailed study of Isidore's early legacy is provided in the essays of Angel C. Vega, Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz, and Bernhard Bischoff found in Isidoriana, edited by Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz (Leon: 1961).[2] Collectively, the relevant studies in Isidoriana lay out and analyse the 7th-century (and later) texts involved in the creation of Isidore's legacy alongside their manuscript traditions. More recently, the introductions and commentary accompanying the Corpus Christianorum editions of the texts involved in the production and reception of Isidore's legacy provide key studies on the subject.[3] This scholarship synthesizes and establishes a fundamental understanding of these texts and their authors and provides a framework for further study. The field has likewise been furthered with the volume edited by Andrew Fear and Jamie Wood, Isidore of Seville and his Reception in the Early Middle Ages: Transmitting and Transforming Knowledge (Amsterdam: 2016). The essays in the volume bring together and analyse decades of advancement in our understanding of these texts and the period and places within which they arose, with Michael J. Kelly's chapter presenting an important re-evaluation of Isidore's early legacy.[4] Building on this work, the goal of this chapter is three-fold. Firstly, it discusses and examines the earliest hagiographical (or historiographical) accounts produced regarding Isidore and his works. The main texts here are the Obitus beatissimi Isidori Hispalensis episcopi of Redemptus of Seville, the Renotatio librorum domini Isidori of Braulio of Zaragoza, and Ildefonsus of Toledo's entry on Isidore in his De viris illustribus. Secondly, it outlines the earliest uses of Isidore in Spain and beyond. This section chronicles in particular the use of Isidore's works and thought by Braulio of Zaragoza (c.590–651), Eugenius II of Toledo (c.600–57) and the Eighth Council of Toledo in 653, Ildefonsus of Toledo (607–67), and Julian of Toledo (c.644–90). Attention is also paid to the earliest use of Isidore in Ireland and Frankish Gaul. Lastly, it examines the earliest manuscript evidence for the circulation of Isidore's writings.

[1] Fontaine addresses many of the same texts covered in the present chapter, albeit in great brevity. His overview of Isidore's legacy in pre-Islamic Iberia covers pages 401–04. Fontaine barely touches upon the subject in his landmark Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique (Paris: 1983), 863 sqq. in the context of the "Isidorian Renaissance."

[2] These essays are Angel C. Vega, "Cuestiones críticas de las biografías isidorianas," in Isidoriana, ed. Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz (León: 1961), 75–98; Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz, "Isidoro en la Edad Media hispana," 345–87 (345–59 cover the early period); Bernhard Bischoff, "Die europäische Verbreitung der Werke Isidors von Sevilla," in Díaz y Díaz, Isidoriana, 317–44. As with Fontaine's epilogue, these essays cover the same material with which the present article is concerned.

Isidore's death on 4 April 636. Redemptus wrote to an unnamed abbot or bishop, at their request. There has been a fair amount of speculation regarding the identity of this unnamed addressee.[6] It may well have been written for Isidore's friend Braulio or indeed for Isidore's successor Honoratus, possibly as a starting point for a no-longer-preserved vita of Isidore.[7] Regardless, the text was clearly designed to be sent out to the ecclesiastical, and presumably political, hierarchy of Visigothic Iberia, and thence read out to their congregations and retainers. The text represents, in form and effect, a letter, albeit a letter containing hagiographical material and underpinned by similarly hagiographical, as well as historiographical, aims.[8] The text represents an emotional account of Isidore's final days. Specifically, it details his final confession, penitence, and blessing, and the response of his flock. The text begins by laying out the context of Isidore's final days: he worked tirelessly for the poor, and, having grown weakened by recurring illnesses, he foresaw his approaching death and summoned two suffragan bishops for his final confession. Isidore then, Redemptus tells us, began receiving into his little cell (cellula) great crowds (tanta agmina) of the faithful of Seville, representative of all the differing groups of society.[9] Isidore then moved himself to near an altar in the basilica and donned the symbols of penitence.[10]

At this point, surrounded by his people and so arrayed, Isidore began his impassioned and heartfelt confession. Redemptus presents Isidore's first speech: Isidore proclaims himself an unworthy sinner and asks God for forgiveness.[11] Having made this confession to God, he received communion from the aforementioned bishops and then addressed the crowd.[12] Where his first speech was a prayer to God, his second speech was a prayer to his people: he humbly asked for their intercession on his behalf alongside forgiveness for all the wrongs which he may have done to them.[13] This speech, Redemptus tells us, was met with great tears and prayers for the remission of the congregation's own sins, accompanied by their forgiveness of all of Isidore's own debts and promises (uincula uel cirografa).[14] Isidore then gives one final address to those assembled, admonishing them to love one another and to live a Christian life.[15] Having completed his confession, Isidore commanded that surplus money be distributed to the poor, and stated his desire to exchange a final greeting and bestow a final blessing on all individually.[16] The text concludes with the assembled crowd leading Isidore back to his cell and, after the fourth day of penitence and confession, Isidore "accomplished an end to his continual pastoral care in peace."[17]

This text represents an important step in the creation of Isidore's legacy. Redemptus strives throughout to present Isidore as a living saint humbly approaching the end of his earthly life. This letter, which on the surface is merely an account of Isidore's last days, functions in precisely the same fashion as contemporary hagiography. Isidore sees his death coming, calmly prepares for it, says his goodbyes and prays for forgiveness, and finally meets it peacefully. The issue of central importance for Redemptus in this text is not the death of Isidore, which appears at the very end almost as an afterthought, but rather the fashion in which Isidore meets it. Redemptus presents Isidore as the saintly pastor, concerned with, and engaged in, the care of his flock to the very end. At both the beginning and end of the text we witness Isidore ministering to the poor and destitute, who are likewise present throughout the text. Isidore's people—not only the clergy and the poor with whom he works daily, but also the rank and file townspeople—love him. The text emphasizes this devotion on both sides. His people weep for and with him, and when he asks for their forgiveness, they respond by giving it, and by asking him to reciprocate. Crucial also is the fact that Isidore foresees his own death: this especially links the Obitus with the genre of hagiography.[18] Redemptus is not here showing us

Isidore the scholar or Isidore the theologian, but Isidore the confessor, Isidore the saint.

Such is the legacy Redemptus set out to create. Redemptus's text is a production of Isidore's close circle in Seville and shows the bishopric's interest in representing Isidore's legacy. The presentation of their great bishop as a saint, and not as a scholar, can be seen as an effort to reinforce the authority of the see: Isidore had already increased Seville's authority significantly during his life as a known scholar and theologian (in addition to his role as tutor and friend to the king); it now remained to cement that authority by elevating Isidore to sainthood.

2.2 Braulio of Zaragoza, Renotatio librorum domini Isidori[19]

The most important single figure for the construction of Isidore's legacy was Braulio of Zaragoza. [20] It was he whom Isidore chose to edit his great Etymologiae, and he who, when the time came, wrote the Renotatio in memory of his teacher. The text is short and something of an obituary, written shortly after the death of its subject.[21] As the title suggests, it presents the reader with a catalogue of Isidore's published works. This catalogue, however, is combined with Braulio's eulogy for his teacher and friend, set as bookends to the list. Braulio appended the text as an additional entry at the end of Isidore's De viris illustribus.[22] This act served to concretize Isidore's place as a vir illustris and allowed Braulio to shape his image and legacy fundamentally.

Braulio begins with a short biographical notice presenting the necessary basic information: he names Isidore, describing him as an "extraordinary man", a uir egregius, as bishop of Seville and brother and successor to Leander, who flourished in the time of Emperor Maurice and King Reccared. Very quickly, however, Braulio moves on to Isidore's achievements, and this first notice represents, in essence, Isidore's professional biography. Braulio writes:

[19] For a parallel discussion of the Renotatio in view of Isidore's De viris illustribus, see Kelly, "The Politics of History-Writing," 96–98.

[20] Braulio was born between 585–594/595 and died in 651. For biography, see Charles H. Lynch, Saint Braulio, Bishop of Saragossa (631–651): His Life and Writings (Washington, DC: 1938). [21] Martín, Scripta, 51.

[22] The manuscript tradition for the Renotatio is connected to that of Isidore's De viris illustribus (as well as with Ildefonsus's continuation). A detailed and comprehensive examination of the manuscript tradition can be found in Martín, Scripta, 92–179.

> In him antiquity gained some new fame for itself, or rather our age saw in him an image of antiquity, for he was a man well trained in every kind of locution, so that the quality of his words made him adaptable for one who was learned and for one who had no knowledge, famous both for suiting his words to his subject and for his incomparable eloquence. It can now be very easy for any prudent reader to judge how great his knowledge was from his varied interests and carefully written works.[23]

After this comes the catalogue. Braulio's list includes seventeen titles, in an order that was logical to the author—perhaps in chronological order of composition, perhaps not.[24] A concise descriptive entry accompanies each title. The Differentiae, the first title listed, is described as "[making] subtle distinctions between the meanings of words which are commonly confused in practice."[25] This succinct description serves as an exemplar of Braulio's treatment of the first sixteen titles. The catalogue provides the reader with a usable, informative, and convenient reference list for Isidore's works.[26] For the Etymologiae, however, the final item on the list, Braulio provides a larger and more detailed entry. This entry serves to link the two authors, but it also showcases the magnum opus of a great thinker. Braulio writes:

> A manuscript of Etymologies, of extremely large size, set off by him by subject matter rather than in books; because he wrote it at my request, [24] The titles, in Braulio's order, are: the Differentiae, the Prooemii, the De ortu et obitu Patrum, the De ecclesiasticis officiis, the Synonyma, the De natura rerum, the De numeris, the De nominibus Legis et Euangeliorum, the De haeresibus, the Sententiae, his Chronica maiora, the Contra Iudaeos, his De uiris illustribus, his monastic Regula, the Historia de regibus Gothorum, Vandalorum et Sueuorum, the Quaestiones, and the Etymologiae. As for whether this order is indeed chronological, for the debate in brief see Kelly, "Politics of History-Writing," 96 ff (in his chapter in the present volume, Graham Barrett offers a different interpretation). For a more detailed discussion, see José Carlos Martín, La 'Renotatio Librorum Domini Isidori' de Braulio de Zaragoza (Logroño: 2002), 74–84.

[25] "Edidit enim libros Differentiarum duos, in quibus subtili discretione ea quae confuse usu proferuntur sensu discrevit," Braulio, Renotatio, trans. Barlow, 140.

> I divided it into fifteen books, although he left it unfinished. This work is suitable to every branch of philosophy; whoever reads and meditates upon it frequently will have and deserve a reputation for knowledge of divine and human affairs. It is packed with elegant statements of many kinds, collected in concise manner; from it, there is practically nothing that cannot be learned.[27]

This entry on the Etymologiae has a very different tone than the other entries in the catalogue and both provides a glowing "review" of the work and serves to connect the description of the text to the first part of Braulio's eulogy. Braulio presents the text as the great encyclopaedia, as the summation of knowledge and model of language, which, at the time, it certainly was. He also presents the Etymologiae as the greatest accomplishment of Isidore the scholar, not only his last work, but his most important.

The final section of the Renotatio sums up the achievements of Isidore. Braulio begins with a sentence that has caused a great deal of scholarly debate by casually referencing a number of other, smaller works by Isidore, although the current general consensus limits the authentic works of Isidore to the seventeen specifically listed.[28] Braulio proceeds to praise Isidore with the words of Cicero regarding Varro:

> As we journeyed and wandered like strangers in our own city your books have, as it were, brought us home, so that we may occasionally know who and where we are. You have revealed the history of our fatherland, the revelations of all time, the sacred laws, the laws of the priests, public and private discipline, the names, kinds, functions, and origins of sees, regions, places, and all things divine and human.[29]

[27] "Etymologiarum codicem nimiae magnitudinis distinctum ab eo titulis, non libris, quem, quia rogatu meo fecit, quamuis inperfectum ipse reliquerit, ego in viginti libros divisi. Quod opus omnimodo philosophiae conveniens quisquis crebra meditatione perlegerit, non ignotus divinarum humanarumque rerum scientia merito erit. Ibi redundans diversarum atrium elegantia, quaecumque fere scire debenture restricta collegit," Braulio, Renotatio, trans. Barlow, 142. Barlow reads quindecim (fifteen) based on Galindo's reading in C.H. Lynch and P. Galindo, San Braulio, Obispo de Zaragoza (631–635), Su Vida y sus Obras (Madrid: 1950), whereas Martín, Scripta, reads viginti (twenty).

[28] See for example, Lynch, Saint Braulio, 216.

[29] "Nos, inquit, in nostra urbe peregrinantes errantesque tanquam hospites tui libri quasi domum reduxerunt, ut possimus aliquando qui et ubi essemus agnoscere. Tu aetatem patriae, tu descriptions temporum, tu sacrorum iura, tu sacerdotum, to domesticam publicamque disciplinam, tu sedium, regionum, locorum, tu omnium diuinarum humanarumque rerum nomina, genera, officia, causas aperuisti," trans. Barlow, 142.

Following this Ciceronian adulation, Braulio praises Isidore in his own words.[30] Braulio chooses to emphasize Isidore's work in quelling the heresy of the Acephali in the Second Council of Seville (held in 619, describing his words against them as a "flood of eloquence", a flumen eloquentiae). After placing Isidore's death in the reigns of the Emperor Heraclius and King Chintila, Braulio gives one final description of his mentor: "of all people he was more outstanding in terms of sound teaching and more prolific in the works of charity."[31]

For a short and relatively unpretentious text, the Renotatio is very informative. Firstly, Braulio possessed precise knowledge of Isidore's works and likely held in his library a substantial body of his mentor's texts.[32] The Renotatio itself was attached to (and ultimately transmitted with) Isidore's De viris illustribus, which suggests that Braulio expected both texts to be circulated and read. Braulio certainly speaks of the texts, especially the Etymologiae, as works that are available to him. The text itself indicates an expectation, at least on Braulio's part, that his readers would be able to access these works.

Principally, however, the text represents Braulio's conscious effort at constructing a positive memory of Isidore and, as such, bears witness both to how Braulio himself viewed his mentor and how he wished others to view him. Indeed, the image that Braulio creates is a crucial one, as he, more than anyone else, was responsible for shaping Isidore's early legacy.[33] Braulio constructs an image of Isidore as a great and prolific scholar. Alongside this stands the glowing description of the Etymologiae as the font of all knowledge and, in a more understated way, the simple and plain descriptions of each of Isidore's works and why they are essential for various fields of knowledge. In many ways, the Renotatio represents an academic's obituary. It highlights the matters that were important to scholars like Isidore and Braulio. Most prominently, Braulio presents the reader with Isidore's publication record and promotes him as an accomplished and influential thinker whose works are of benefit to all, not only to the educated elite. In so doing, he outlines Isidore's immense contributions to the field of knowledge. Braulio also draws attention to Isidore's role in condemning the Acephali, presenting him as an accomplished theologian. Yet, the Renotatio is not solely concerned with the legacy of Isidore the scholar: the reader must note that the text's final statement, its final emphasis, focuses upon Isidore the holy man, Isidore the saint. Braulio ends the text by stating that Isidore "was more generous than all in the works of charity" ("cunctis et copiosior operibus caritatis"). This parallels Redemptus's text directly and helps to lay the groundwork for Isidore's veneration as a saint, separate from his scholarly achievements. Braulio effectively sets up the two-fold cult of St Isidore: on the one side stands Isidore the uir egregius, eloquent and learned, and on the other side Isidore the Saint, dedicated to acts of charity.

2.3 Ildefonsus of Toledo, Regarding Isidore of Seville in the De viris illustribus[34]

The third and final in the series of early accounts of Isidore is by Ildefonsus of Toledo in his continuation of Isidore's De viris illustribus.[35] Unlike the works of Redemptus and Braulio, Ildefonsus's De viris illustribus is slightly more remote, dating from some point during his tenure as bishop of Toledo (657–67).[36] Unlike the previous two authors, Ildefonsus was not a member of Isidore's direct circle. Rather, he was solidly rooted in the ecclesiastical context of Toledo. Prior to replacing his mentor, Eugenius II, as metropolitan of Toledo, Ildefonsus served as abbot of the monastery of Agali, located outside Toledo.[37] Ildefonsus's continuation of the De viris illustribus departs substantially from previous versions of the De viris illustribus tradition in several important ways.[38]

---

[34] For a parallel discussion, see Kelly, "The Politics of History-Writing," 101–03.

[35] Isidore's De viris illustribus is itself a continuation of those of Jerome and Gennadius.

[36] A thorough discussion (along with the text) can be found in Valeriano Yarza Urquiola and Carmen Codoñer, eds., Ildefonsi Toletani episcopi opera, CCSL 114A (Turnhout: 2007), 475–617. See also A.T. Fear, trans., Lives of the Visigothic Fathers (Liverpool: 1997), xxxiii-xxxvi. The text was written some point after the death of Eugenius II of Toledo in 657, whose substantial entry is found at the end of the text. The text is, of course, a continuation of Isidore's own.

[37] As abbot, Ildefonsus was a signatory of VIII Toledo, discussed below.

[38] The Christian tradition of the De viris illustribus begins with Jerome (d. 420), whose text (written in 392) sought to establish a Christian intellectual tradition that could stand up against pagan criticisms. In essence, Jerome's De viris illustribus creates a universal biographical-bibliographical record of the achievements of Christian authors, albeit one selected/controlled by the author himself. Gennadius of Marseille (died *c.*496) continued Jerome's text, if with a somewhat more thematic and Gallic-provincial focus. Isidore's text (written 615–18) sought to fill a perceived gap in the coverage, namely, he sought to give Hispania its place in the canon of Christian letters. For the tradition, as outlined here, Jamie Wood, "Playing the Fame Game: Bibliography, Celebrity, and Primacy in Late Antique Spain," Journal of Early Christian Studies 20 (2012), 613–40. For the development of the late

Ildefonsus's work is far narrower than that of his predecessors, focused not so much even upon the Iberian church but upon that of Toledo, and further shifting the focus from specifically men of letters to bishops, whether prominent authors or not.[39] The biographical entries occur in chronological order, and, although relatively brief, Isidore's entry, the eighth, is among the longer ones. Ildefonsus split his account of Isidore's life into roughly two parts: the first provides a brief biography of Isidore, and the second a short catalogue of his works. The text resembles on the surface Braulio's Renotatio, a logical approach, given their placement in the De viris illustribus tradition, yet its treatment of Isidore is decidedly different.[40]

Ildefonsus's biography of Isidore begins with his succession to the bishopric of Seville following the death of his brother Leander. Ildefonsus describes Isidore as such:

> A man distinguished both by his looks and intellect. His ability in speaking reached such a pitch of fluency and delight that his wondrous richness of expression left his audience enraptured to such a degree that a man who had heard him would not remember what he had said unless it was repeated many times. He wrote famous works and no small number of them […].[41]

Following this description, Ildefonsus provides a summary of Isidore's works. The list is decidedly less well organized and is shorter than Braulio's, and largely lacks the descriptions found in the Renotatio. Ildefonsus details, in order, the antique tradition of the De viris illustribus, see the survey of Eustaquio Sánchez Salor, "El género de los de viris illustribus de Jerónimo a Ildefonso de Toledo: su finalidad," Talia dixit 1 (2006), 29–54.

[39] The shift between Ildefonsus and Isidore, and between the Iberian tradition and that of Jerome and Gennadius, has been the subject of substantial scholarship. Key to this change is a shift in genre: away from bibliography, towards biography or hagiography (or historiography). Key to this debate are Pedro Juan Galán Sánchez, "El De viris illustribus de Ildefonso de Toledo o la modificación del género," Anuario de estudios filológicos 15 (1992), 69–80; Jacques Fontaine, "El De uiris illustribus de San Ildefonso de Toledo: tradición y originalidad," Anales Toledanos 3 (1971), 79–96; Wood, "Playing the Fame Game," 621–22 and 628–37; and Kelly, "Politics of History-Writing," 101–03; see also Díaz y Díaz, "Isidoro en la Edad Media hispana," 353–54.

[40] Kelly, "Politics of History-Writing," 101–03.

[41] "Vir decore simul et ingenio pollens, nam tantae iucunditatis adfluentem copiam in eloquendo promeruit, ut ubertas admiranda dicendi ex eo in stuporem verteret audientes, ex quo audita is qui audisset, nonnisi repetita saepius, commendaret. Scripsit opera et eximia et non parva […]," Ildefonsus of Toledo, De viris illustribus, trans. Fear, Lives of the Visigothic Fathers, 116.

De ecclesiasticis officiis, the Prooemia, the De ortu et obitu Patrum, the Synonyma, the De fide catholica contra Iudaeos, the De natura rerum, the Differentiae, the Sententiae, the Quaestiones, and the Etymologiae.[42] Ildefonsus draws particular attention to Braulio's role in instigating the writing of the Etymologiae, and describes it as an unfinished text that Isidore worked on until the day of his death. Following this list, Ildefonsus gives a brief note of the Visigothic kings during whose reigns Isidore lived. He ends the text by referring to Isidore as "an outstanding glory and ornament of the Holy Faith."[43]

The tone of Ildefonsus's short account of Isidore and his life and works is markedly different from that adopted by Redemptus and Braulio. Certainly, Ildefonsus pays deference to Isidore and his intellectual abilities, but Ildefonsus's compliments almost appear as a criticism: Isidore was so eloquent and well spoken that no one knew what he was saying.[44] The fact that Ildefonsus fails to provide the full list of Isidore's works is also telling, particularly when one pays attention to the omissions. Ildefonsus cuts Isidore's historical and mystical writings alongside his monastic rule and, in so doing, presents his reader with a very different version of Isidore the author.[45] Isidore's De viris illustribus finds itself swept under the rug by Ildefonsus: a particularly pointed omission, considering that Ildefonsus references it (as an essentially faulty work) in the preface to his own De viris illustribus.[46] The distinctly positive light in which both the Obitus and the Renotatio portrayed Isidore is absent in the De viris illustribus: indeed, one scholar has gone so far as to describe

---

[42] Ildefonsus fails to mention the De numeris, the De nominibus Legis et Euangeliorum, the De haeresibus, his Chronica, his De viris illustribus, his Monastica regula, and the De origine Gothorum et regno Suevorum et etiam Vandalorum Historia.

[43] "Doctrinae sanctae gloriam pariter et decorem," Ildefonsus of Toledo, De viris illustribus, trans. Fear, Lives of the Visigothic Fathers, 117.

[44] This backhanded compliment is not the only way Ildefonsus cuts down Isidore at the same time that he is building him up. As Wood, "Playing the Fame Game," 637, has pointed out, Ildefonsus depicts Isidore as "an old-style illustrious man in a list that was written to redefine what it meant to be illustrious." He also cuts out most of Braulio's praise for Isidore, see Kelly, "Politics of History-Writing," 101.

[45] Fear, Lives of the Visigothic Fathers, xxxv-xxxvi, attributes the failure to mention the Historia Gothorum to a desire to protect Isidore in light of the controversy surrounding King Suinthila. Kelly, "Politics of History-Writing," 101, sees this in light of Ildefonsus's attempts to strengthen the position of Toledo within the text. Kelly, "Politics of History-Writing," 102, likewise associates the omission of Isidore's Regula with Ildefonsus's efforts to privilege the monastery at Agali, which employed the rule of the African Donatus, who was included in Ildefonsus's De viris illustribus.

[46] In light of this omission, in a useful examination of the text, Kelly, "Politics of History-Writing," 101–03, frames Ildefonsus's De viris illustribus as a response to both Isidore's De viris illustribus and Braulio's Renotatio.

Ildefonsus's portrayal of Isidore as a "treacherous attack."[47] The principal reason for this decidedly less positive treatment of Isidore appears to stem from Ildefonsus's position as metropolitan of Toledo in a time when Toledo was attempting to assert dominance over the church in Iberia.[48] Isidore lent great prestige to the see of Seville, a prestige promoted by the works of Redemptus and Braulio. Seville possessed a long-seated ecclesiastical and intellectual prominence, whereas Toledo was principally the city of the Visigothic kings. In his De viris illustribus, Ildefonsus was attempting to assert the intellectual and ecclesiastical dominance of Toledo over Seville. Through his abbreviated list of Isidore's works, as Kelly has pointed out, Ildefonsus essentially strips Isidore of his role as the "grand architect of consensus and unity", as he has come to be seen, in order that he can shift this role onto the bishops of Toledo.[49] Thus, Ildefonsus played down the legacy of Isidore and championed that of his own Toledan forebears.[50]

3 Citations of and References to Isidore in Iberian Writings of the Later 7th Century

The Iberian authors in the generation following the death of Isidore did not create a single legacy for their illustrious predecessor. Rather, these first-generation accounts formed a divided and competing historiographical legacy for Isidore.[51] Yet, Isidore's works also spoke for themselves and helped to ensure his intellectual dominance. Even in their disparity, the earliest hagiographical/historiographical accounts laid the foundations for the cult of Isidore and his legacy as both scholar and saint. Collectively, they paint a positive picture of Isidore and they furnish us with something of an "official version" of how he was to be represented, a framework for contextualizing how he was viewed in later 7th-century Iberia. Yet they do not present the full scope of his early legacy and reception. For that, we must look at how his successors in the Visigothic kingdom employed his texts within their own.

[48] This effort, which began under Eugenius II, to reorient the Visigothic church towards Toledo spanned several decades in the mid-7th century. Partly this was done through church councils, but there was also a literary element. Eugenius II's poetry served to co-opt Isidore's intellectual might into a Toledan-centred cultural and educational programme ultimately brought to full realization by Julian of Toledo (bishop from 680 to 690). For the growing ecclesiastical dominance of Toledo, see Peter Linehan, History and the Historians of Medieval Spain (Oxford: 1993), 54–56, and Roger Collins, Visigothic Spain: 409–711 (Oxford: 2006), 83. 4 Braulio of Zaragoza (*c.*590–651)

In the Renotatio, we see Isidore depicted as both a saint dedicated to works of charity and the greatest scholar of his age, whose works paved the path towards knowledge and understanding. This depiction is central to Braulio's construction of Isidore's legacy. We know from both the Renotatio and from their correspondence that Braulio was familiar with the works of Isidore. These texts, however, do not provide the entire picture.

Aside from the direct correspondence between the two bishops, we find reference to Isidore of Seville in three of Braulio's letters. Letter 14, addressed to the priest Fronimian (to whom Braulio likewise addressed his Vita Sancti Aemiliani), presents Isidore as an authority on matters of liturgical practice. The second reference is in letter 22, addressed to a Bishop Eutropius, regarding the dating of Easter. Isidore appears here as the last in a list of authorities on the subject in question.[52] Braulio refers to Isidore as "the distinguished man of our time."[53] Once again, Isidore is described in glowing terms, this time as a vir insignis. The third reference comes in letter 44, addressed to Bishop Fructuosus of Braga, who had posed Braulio several questions. Having thoroughly answered the question regarding the timing of the death of Methuselah with references to Jerome and Augustine, Braulio proceeded to quote Isidore's Etymologiae as well. Once again, Isidore is glowingly described, this time as a "man of incomparable knowledge."[54] Braulio thus employs Isidore as his ultimate authority on a consistent basis.

5 Eugenius II of Toledo (*c.*600–57)

Eugenius II of Toledo, Braulio's student, was very different in terms of his use of Isidore's works. Unlike his predecessors, Eugenius's literary efforts were principally poetic, and his verse shows clearly the influence of Isidore.[55] Eugenius possessed a firm knowledge of Isidore's works.[56] He appears to have held a particular affection for the Etymologiae, as a number of his original poems versify various pieces of information drawn directly from this text. Eugenius's poetic corpus contains over sixty points of parallel with Isidore's works, with a little over forty stemming from the Etymologiae.[57]

[52] Isidore, Etymologiae 6.17.5–9.

[53] "Nostri temporis vir insignis," Braulio, Epistola 22.

[54] "Incomparabilis scientiae vir," Braulio, Epistola 44. The Isidorian citation here is actually rather gratuitous: the Etymologiae passage is somewhat off-topic and the Jerome text cited had directly answered the question at hand.

The majority of Eugenius's "Isidorian poems" are straightforward versifications of snippets from the natural history sections of the Etymologiae. These are principally located in the collection of distichs on natural history found between carmen 42 and 64 in Eugenius's corpus.[58] Carmen 62, De adamante, provides a representative example of how Eugenius employed Isidore's works. While Eugenius' poem does not directly cite the Etymologiae, it does contain information directly obtained from it, namely, the use of goat blood to soften the otherwise unbreakable rock adamant (and the non-typical spelling of the word adamas as adamans).[59] Eugenius's poem contains the same information as the passage from Isidore, it merely distils it into a short two lines of verse. This is Eugenius's general approach in the "Isidorian" distichs, which cover topics ranging from ornithology to geology. Eugenius's use of Isidore was not, however, restricted to these short informational versifications, as the poet also employed Isidore's works as reference for several of his longer poems. Carmen 39, De inventoribus litterarum, is another example of Eugenius's distillation of Isidore's vast reservoir of information into brief verses. This poem condenses several sentences from the Etymologiae, and some from the Historia Gothorum, into six lines of verse listing the various inventors of the alphabets known at the time.[60] These two poems demonstrate Eugenius's use of Isidore as an encyclopaedia, much as prescribed by Braulio.

[55] Discussions of Eugenius's use of Isidore can be found in Díaz y Díaz, "Isidoro en la Edad Media hispana," 350–51, and Mark Lewis Tizzoni, The Poems of Dracontius in their Vandalic and Visigothic Contexts (PhD dissertation, University of Leeds, 2012), 238 and 246–47, and Tizzoni, "(De-)constructing." Eugenius wrote works other than poetry, but, apart from his letters, none of his other writings have survived.

[56] Eugenius was, at the very least, familiar with the Differentiae, the Synonyma, the De natura rerum, the Sententiae, his Chronica, his De uiris illustribus, the Historia de regibus Gothorum, Vandalorum et Sueuorum, and the Etymologiae. For a comprehensive list of loci similes with Isidore's texts, see the index fontium in Paulo Farmhouse Alberto, ed., Eugenii Toletani Opera Omnia, CCSL 114 (Turnhout: 2005), 425–26.

[57] Isidore, in fact, represents one of Eugenius's most used sources for his poetry.

[58] Eugenius, carmina 42–52 (excluding carmen 49) and carmina 59–64 are drawn from Isidore.

[59] See Isidore, Etymologiae 16.13.2. Eugenius and Isidore both employ the non-typical spelling.

[60] While Eugenius reordered the list and cut out some the names, his information clearly parallels that given by Isidore. It could be argued, of course, that Eugenius was using

It is with this use of Isidore as a font of knowledge that we first see Eugenius's role in the creation of Isidore's legacy, as well as glimpse an important part of his early reception. Firstly, it demonstrates that, by the time Eugenius was writing these poems, Isidore was viewed as an authority and his Etymologiae as a reference for all things "scientific." Secondly, it shows the strength of his influence on one of the most important metropolitans of Toledo: an influence that his successor Ildefonsus strove unsuccessfully to curb. The most striking aspect of Eugenius's usage of Isidore, however, comes when one considers that these poems were likely to have been used as classroom exercises.[61] This means not only that Isidore was seen as a fundamental source of knowledge, but that young students, whether in Zaragoza or Toledo (or both), were being exposed to, and engaging with, Isidore's texts.[62] This educational use represents a much wider and deeper exposure to Isidore than is represented simply by his peers and their successors, such as Redemptus, Braulio, and Ildefonsus. Isidore was being presented in the classroom, information derived ultimately from his works was being taught to future monks, clerics, and laymen, to anyone in attendance at the episcopal school in Toledo or the monastic school in Zaragoza. This use of his intellectual output hints at the potential extent of Isidore's influence and reception on the ground, and shows how his legacy may have spread to future generations in Visigothic Iberia.

6 The Eighth Council of Toledo, 653

Eugenius's role in the transmission of Isidore's legacy was not limited to his poetic works. As metropolitan of Toledo, he presided alongside King

Isidore's sources, rather than Isidore himself, but the sheer volume of Isidorian resonances, coupled with Eugenius's position as Braulio's student and intellectual successor, are highly suggestive.

[61] Considerable evidence exists to indicate that these poems were written by Eugenius to be used as teaching aids in class, and this is the position of the present author. It can also be asserted that these were exercises drawn up by Eugenius as a student in Zaragoza (the more typical assertion). Considering that he became metropolitan of Toledo in 647, and the Etymologiae only came into Braulio's possession in the 630s (by which time Eugenius was already Braulio's archdeacon), it is most likely that his primary and rhetorical education was completed by the time of the text's publication. Whichever the case, the text belonged in the classroom, and the implications for Isidore's legacy and reception remain the same.

Recceswinth (r. 649–72) over the Eighth Council of Toledo. This council represented another important point in the creation of Isidore's legacy.[63] The council covered a range of topics, but the matter of central concern for the purpose of the current chapter is its direct reference to Isidore and how his memory is employed in the council records.[64]

The first of these matters is straightforward: in the discussion regarding the treatment of refugi and perfidi, exiles/expatriates and traitors, found in the second canon, Isidore's Sententiae and Synonyma are used to provide an authoritative theological proof.[65] The canon quoted both texts directly and cited them by name. The canon presents Isidore as the final proof, following Augustine of Hippo and Gregory the Great, and so, as the final authority, his words carry more weight. That VIII Toledo should afford Isidore the status of chief authority, even over Augustine and Gregory, shows the power of Isidore's legacy in 653.

This level of intellectual and theological authority is underscored by the language in which Isidore is described. The records of the council state:

> The extraordinary doctor (doctor egregius) of our century, the most recent/utmost honor of the universal church, the most recent in an age of excelling people, not the lowest in the formation of doctrine; and what is more, at the limit of the present ages he is the most learned.[66]

Here, we witness the elevation of Isidore from Braulio's vir egregius to doctor egregius by Braulio's student Eugenius. For the bishops of Iberia, united together in council with the highest nobility of the Peninsula, Isidore was a teacher from whom all could learn, and the utmost authority available to them. The efforts of Isidore's earliest hagiographers had borne fruit.

[63] As Kelly, "Politics of History-Writing," 98, points out, VIII Toledo contains the first official recognition of Isidore's intellectual authority by the Toledan power structure.

7 Ildefonsus of Toledo (607–67)

Despite the rather underwhelming praise given to Isidore by Ildefonsus in his De viris illustribus, Ildefonsus was nevertheless familiar with, and indebted to, the works of his Sevillian predecessor. The most obvious evidence of this is the simple fact that Ildefonsus, regardless of his motivations, chose to write a continuation of (or response to) Isidore's own continuation of the De viris illustribus and included, as we have seen, Isidore himself. In the preface, he describes Isidore as a vir prudentissimus, a most sensible (or skilled) man. The reference to Isidore in the De viris illustribus, however, pales in comparison to his influence on Ildefonsus's other works.

Indeed, Ildefonsus's three main theological works—the De virginitate Sanctae Mariae, his most famous work, which asserts the perpetual virginity of Mary; the De cognitione baptismi, a doctrinal treatise on baptism; and the De itenere deserti, a treatise on the Christian life—all bear a substantial debt to the collected works of Isidore.[67] All three texts are replete with parallels to Isidore's works, but the most heavily employed are the De ecclesiasticis officiis, the Etymologiae, and the De fide catholica contra Iudaeos. In terms of source material, the De cognitione baptismi is particularly indebted to the De ecclesiasticis officiis, as the De virginitate is to the De fide catholica contra Iudaeos. The De virginitate provides a good example of the extent to which Ildefonsus employed the works of Isidore. Firstly, Ildefonsus wrote the text in a synonymic fashion following Isidore's Synonyma. Inside this Isidorian structure, Ildefonsus constructed his arguments using evidence drawn directly from Jerome, and especially from Isidore.[68] The preface to the text contains certain, if not overt, parallels with the Synonyma which become more pronounced as it progresses.[69] Indeed, of the sixty-two chapters of the De fide catholica contra Iudaeos in the Migne edition, Ildefonsus employs thirty-two in writing his De virginitate.[70]

[67] Thorough summations of Ildefonsus's use of sources, including of Isidore, are given, by book, in Yarza Urquiola and Codoñer, Ildefonsi Toletani episcopi opera, 73–85, 318–30, and 549–53 (for the De viris illustribus). Isidore's profound influence on Ildefonsus, the foremost theologian of the last decades of the Visigothic kingdom, demonstrates the extent of his influence on 7th-century Iberian thought. Ildefonsus nevertheless fails to cite Isidore by name (we must remember, of course, Ildefonsus's loyalty to the see of Toledo, mentioned earlier).[71] He may not give credit to Isidore, but it was no longer possible, nor was it desirable, to ignore him.

8 Other Iberian Sources[72]

Isidore's early legacy hardly confined itself to these authors. The Lex Visigothorum, for example, bears the marks of Isidore's Sententiae, and the Vitas Sanctorum Patrum Emeritensum made use of the Synonyma.[73] Fructuosus of Braga (died *c.*665), working in north-western Iberia, heavily employed the works of Isidore, especially his monastic regula, when writing his own monastic rules.[74] Indeed, Isidore even features in the Vita Sancti Fructuosi, written sometime after the bishop of Braga's death by an unnamed disciple of his.[75] Taio of Zaragoza, another student of Braulio, was likewise part of this ever-growing Isidorian "school."[76]

Julian of Toledo was another writer strongly influenced by Isidore. Metropolitan of Toledo from 680 to 690, he, like his predecessors, was the product of a markedly Isidorian intellectual training. Like Ildefonsus, Julian was both abbot of Agali and a student of Eugenius II.[77] In his theological works Julian employed the writings of Isidore alongside those of Augustine and Gregory the Great. Like Ildefonsus, he also failed to cite Isidore as a source.[78] More pertinent still is the mention of Isidore in the records of the Fifteenth Council of Toledo, which Julian presided over as primate in 688.[79] Once more, Isidore, whose legacy was by this point so established that he did not even need to be properly named, is the doctor egregius, cited as a key authority alongside Augustine, Ambrose, and Athanasius.[80]

9 The Earliest Use of Isidore in Non-Iberian Sources

9.1 The Earliest Irish Evidence[81]

Outside Visigothic Iberia, Ireland represents one of the earliest traceable avenues for the reception of Isidore's work. Scholars, notably J.N. Hillgarth, have argued that Ireland was connected very early on to the intellectual world of the Iberian Peninsula and North Africa.[82] Recently, the earliest links have been called into serious question.[83] While doubt lingers regarding most of the 7th century, by its final decade/s Isidore's writings had arrived in Ireland and from that point rose to prominence.[84] The Etymologiae represent the most widely used of Isidore's writings in Irish contexts at the end of the 7th and opening of the 8th century, but there was also knowledge of other texts, including the De Episcopi Opera, CCSL 115 (Turnhout: 1976), xvi-xviii. Julian used Isidore for his Prognosticon futuri saeculi, his Liber Anticimen, and his Ars grammatica. Again, Julian should be seen as continuing the Toledan consolidation undertaken by his predecessors.

[79] This council, in many ways, was an assertion of the theological strength of the Iberian church.

[83] Marina Smyth, "Isidorian Texts," 112–14. This early evidence stemmed in part from links between Lathcen MacBaith's Egloga de Moralibus in Iob, dated *c.*650–61, and Isidore's De ortu et obitu Patrum: these links, it is argued, result from a Carolingian interpolation. Smyth provides substantial bibliography.

natura rerum and the Differentiae.[85] As Hillgarth states of Ireland: “nowhere else, outside of Isidore’s own Spain, can one find anything approaching either the range of works used or the range of writers using them.”[86] It may only be that this is truer of the early-8th century than of the mid-7th century.

9.2 The Earliest Frankish Evidence[87]

While the evidence for Isidore’s early legacy in Gaul is scant compared to Ireland and Iberia, knowledge of his work arrived there before the end of the 7th century. Most of the Frankish evidence revolves around a single Isidorian text, the Chronica. Isidore was known to Defensor of Ligugé (working around 700), Theofrid, abbot of Corbie (d. after 683), and the writer of the late-7th-century Vita Wandregesili.[88] Perhaps the most important piece of early Frankish evidence, however, comes from the Fredegar Chronicle.

Originating at some point in the latter half of the 7th century, the Fredegar Chronicle, albeit a multi-layered and somewhat problematic text, provides some of the earliest evidence for Isidore’s use outside of Iberia.[89] The principal Isidorian text in question when discussing the Fredegar Chronicle is Isidore’s own Chronica. The text’s manuscript tradition is complicated, but Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, lat. 10910, dating from the late-7th to the early-8th century, is of particular importance in discussing the legacy of Isidore.[90]

[89] The oldest version of the chronicle dates to c.660. For this date, see Roger Collins, Die Fredegar-Chroniken (Hanover: 2007), 105–07. For studies of the Fredegar Chronicle alongside text and translation, see Olivier Devillers and Jean Meyers, Frédégaíre: Chronique des temps mérovingiens (Turnhout: 2001) and J.M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Fourth Book of the Chronicle of Fredegar (Westport: 1981). For an important recent study, including the manuscript tradition, see Helmut Reimitz, History, Frankish Identity and the Framing of Western Ethnicity, 550–850 (Cambridge: 2015), 166–239. In light of the recent work on Isidore in Ireland, the Fredegar Chronicle may well represent the first evidence for Isidore’s use outside of Iberia.

[90] Wallace-Hadrill, The Fourth Book of the Chronicle of Fredegar, xlvii. For this manuscript and especially the placement of Isidore’s writing within it, see also Walter Goffart, “The Fredegar Problem Reconsidered,” Speculum 38 (1963), 206–41.

Indeed, the earliest manuscript history of the Fredegar Chronicle matches that of Isidore's Chronica in Frankish Gaul—Paris BnF lat. 10910 contains both Isidore's Chronica and the earliest version of the Fredegar Chronicle, although this is the only manuscript of the Fredegar Chronicle to do so.[91]

In the prologue to part four of Paris BnF lat. 10910, representing the actual "chronicle of Fredegar", the chronicler writes that he or she carefully reviewed (dilientissime percurrens) the chronicle of Isidore, along with a number of other chronicles.[92] The first book of the codex, largely following the Liber generationis of Hippolytus of Rome, contains, in Paris BnF lat. 10910, chapter three of Isidore's chronicle.[93] More significantly, at the end of book four in this codex one finds a transcription of Isidore's Chronica with an explicit dated to the fortieth year of the reign of Clothar II (623–24).[94] The relationship between the Chronica and Fredegar, whether the Chronica was original to the codex, or when it may have been added, is intensely debated by scholars.[95] If the Isidorian material is original, and it was indeed written around 660, it bears witness to a relatively swift transmission of the Chronica into Frankish territory. If we are to trust the date given at the end of Isidore's chronicle in Paris BnF lat. 10910, then the text was likely present in Gaul during the lifetime of Isidore, a rapid transmission indeed. If the Chronica's inclusion in the manuscript is a later addition by a scribe, it nevertheless shows that Isidore's work was present in Gaul in the 7th century, suggesting that elements of it had arrived and been copied soon after their composition.[96] In addition to the presence of Isidore's Chronica both as part of the text and as an appendix to it, the Fredegar Chronicle also makes use, at one point, of the Etymologiae. This usage comes, once more, from the prologue to part four where the Fredegar chronicler defines the word chronica with the definition provided by Isidore at Etymologiae, 5.28. Taken together, these references demonstrate that, even if the Chronica was merely appended to the manuscript at a later date, the original version of the Fredegar Chronicle, composed in 7th-century Gaul, referenced, took into consideration, and used as an authority, the work of Isidore of Seville.

[94] Devillers and Meyers, Frédégaíre, 8–10. Isidore's Chronica maiora exists in two redactions, the earlier dating to Sisebut's reign (in 615/616) and the second to that of Suinthila's (in 626); see, with references, Sam Koon and Jamie Wood, "The Chronica Maiora of Isidore of Seville," e-Spania 6 (2008).

[95] Devillers and Meyers, Frédégaíre, 8–10. The fact that Isidore's Chronica appears in no other manuscripts of Fredegar lends support to scholars who suggest that the addition of Isidore's Chronica stemmed not from the compiler of Fredegar's chronicle but rather the scribe of Paris BnF lat. 10910, see Reimitz, History, 221–22.

[96] The latest plausible date put forward for Paris 10910 is 714: even accepting this date, and whether the internal dating is credible (or not), it is clear that Isidore's text existed in Gaul by the beginning of the 8th century.

10 7th-Century Manuscript Evidence for the Circulation of Isidore's Writings

As we have seen, 7th-century Visigothic, Frankish, and Irish literature all bear witness to the early transmission of Isidore's works, even during his own lifetime. Much of the manuscript evidence is later and less clear, although it helps to paint a picture of Isidore's early influence and dissemination.[97] Perhaps the most important manuscript for this discussion is Sankt Gallen, Stiftsbibliothek, 226, a papyrus codex originating in the latter half of the 7th century within a continental Irish context.[98] This codex contains an abridged copy of Isidore's Synonyma and bears witness to knowledge of this text north of the Pyrenees. Also important is the late 7th- or early 8th-century Paris BnF lat. 10910, which, as discussed above, transmits a portion of Isidore's Chronica. Another relevant manuscript is Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, lat. 6400G, a three-part codex which contains Isidore's De natura rerum, written in 7th- to 8th-century uncial (part two of the codex), and De ecclesiasticis officiis, written in an 8th-century uncial argued to be of northern Gallic origin (part three of the codex).[99] These very early manuscripts all point to the presence of a selection of Isidore's works in Gaul (or more precisely in the network of Irish monasteries in Gaul and beyond) by the close of the 7th century. While few in number, the 7th-century manuscripts serve to complete the picture painted by the literary sources. Evidence from the 8th century is much more extensive.[100] The 8th century provides us with numerous surviving manuscripts from Italy and Gaul and displays, above all else, the importance of the Irish in the development of Isidore's legacy.[101]

[97] The most in-depth studies of Isidore's manuscript traditions are to be found in the CCSL editions of his works cited in the bibliography. Another important work, detailing the subject as it was in 1961 is Bischoff, "Die europäische Verbreitung der Werke Isidors von Sevilla," 317–44.

[98] Jacques Elfassi, ed., Isidori Hispalensis Episcopi Synonyma, CCSL 111B (Turnhout: 2009), xxix-xxxv (with bibliography), and also Bischoff, "Die europäische Verbreitung," 323, where it is numbered as 227. Both of these sources place the text in the south of France (Elfassi suggests Lyon). Hillgarth, "Early Christian Ireland," 184, on the other hand, places the text initially in Ireland, with transmission to Bobbio possibly in the 9th century.

[99] Christopher M. Lawson, ed., Sancti Isidori Episcopi Hispalensis De ecclesiasticis officiis, CCSL 113 (Turnhout: 1989), 208, and Bischoff, "Die europäische Verbreitung," 324. Hillgarth, "Early Christian Ireland," 185, places the manuscript at Fleury.

11 Conclusion

The impact that Isidore had upon the intellectual culture of the Latin West in his own century was both profound and pervasive. His thought dominated the world of later-7th-century Iberia, his works pervaded everything from basic instruction in the classroom to the highest affairs of church and state. His students, and their students, used his work to forge a powerful Visigothic-era theological tradition. Even those, like Ildefonsus and Julian, who sought to assert Toledo's authority over Seville, and thus over an important element of Isidore's legacy, could not avoid saturating their own writings with his. His works possessed such utility and fame that they were quickly transmitted both to Ireland and to Gaul, possibly even before his death. He was received universally as an authority of high standing: in Iberia, at the very least, he was placed alongside and sometimes even above Augustine, Jerome, and Gregory the Great.

This legacy was built with care. A priest of Seville, Redemptus, recorded his last days, presenting him as truly a saint, worthy, through his care, devotion, and humility, of the rewards of Heaven. His student, Braulio, likewise presented his beloved teacher as a saint, given always to works of charity. Yet, like Isidore, Braulio was himself a theologian and a scholar, and so he depicted his teacher in this light too. Isidore's scholarly reputation was established early, and this is how Ildefonsus chose to portray him, however begrudgingly. These early biographies of Isidore, combined with inexorably increasing knowledge of his works and their usefulness, served to build for Isidore a bipartite saint's cult—on one side stood Isidore, devoted to charity, caretaker of the poor, and champion of orthodoxy, and on the other stood Isidore the scholar, doctor egregius, the greatest authority of the early medieval Iberian Peninsula.

CHAPTER 15

Isidore amongst the Islands: The Reception and Use of Isidore of Seville in Britain and Ireland in the Early Middle Ages

Martin J. Ryan,
Independent Scholar

1 Introduction[1]

In the garden of Llanllyr House in what is now Ceredigion, Wales, stands an early medieval inscribed stone—much abused and now missing its left-hand side. Despite this damage, the inscription can still be made out:

> TESQUITUS DITOC MADOMNUAC OCCON FILIUS ASAITGEN DEDIT[2]

In other words, the stone records the gift of the tesquitus of Ditoc that Occon, son of Asaitgen, gave to Madomnuac (or Modomnoc, as he appears in other sources). What is meant by tesquitus is more difficult to discern: Nash-Williams suggested "waste-plot"; more recently, Handley offered "hermitage" or "monastery." For our purposes, the meaning of the word matters less than its source: tesquitus was coined from tesqua—an obscure word, known only in Britain through Isidore's Etymologiae.

The Llanllyr inscription with its link to Isidore is both remarkable and unsurprising. Remarkable, because the evidence for Latin learning and religious culture in Wales in this period is meagre even by early-medieval standards.[3] Unsurprising, for the works of Isidore were central to learning in Britain and Ireland in this period: they were studied, copied, epitomised, expanded, glossed, even fabricated. For the Irish, Isidore's Etymologiae were the Culmen, the summit, the highest peak of learning.[4] Some of the earliest manuscripts of Isidore's writings come from an Irish cultural milieu; so, too, do some of the earliest Isidorian pseudepigrapha—back-handed, but a compliment nonetheless. Readers in the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms were just as enthusiastic. At the archiepiscopal school at Canterbury, the Etymologiae were the lecturer's crib of choice, guiding not just how texts ought to be understood but also how they should be read and taught. In the north, Isidore's impact was equally great. On his deathbed, the Northumbrian monk the Venerable Bede devoted his attention to two texts; the first was the Gospel of John, the second was Isidore's De natura rerum.

This chapter offers an introduction to the reception and influence of Isidore's writings in Britain and Ireland in the pre-Viking period, that is, to roughly 750. To keep things manageable, the focus will be on Latin texts—though this should not be understood as implying that Isidore's impact on vernacular literature was negligible or unimportant. Likewise, the surviving evidence means that this work will concentrate on Ireland and the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms—though as the Llanllyr stone shows, Isidore's appeal reached further.

2 Isidore in Ireland

The central place of the Irish in the early reception of Isidore's writings has long been acknowledged. In the second decade of the 20th century, Beeson noted that Isidore was known in Ireland (and England, too) very early, while more recently McNally, Bischoff, and, above all, Hillgarth have championed the Irish as especially early adopters.[5] Though Beeson knew of no early Irish copies of Isidore's works, important discoveries were made subsequently. Most significant was the identification of fragments from Book XI.i of the Etymologiae in what is now St Gallen Stiftsbibliothek 1399 a 1. These fragments date to the middle decades of the 7th century—Bischoff even suggested to Isidore's own lifetime—and were written in an Insular hand, most likely in Ireland itself; they remain the earliest manuscript witness to the Etymologiae.[6] A slightly later set of fragments—parts of Books 6 and 7—preserved as the flyleaves of Longleat House, Marquess of Bath, NMR 10589, are likewise the product of an Irish scribe, again, probably working in Ireland.[7]

Herren has written that in the second half of the 7th century Ireland witnessed "a kind of 'Isidorian revolution of knowledge.'"[8] This revolution was but one part of a wider flourishing of scholarly and artistic endeavour over the course of the 7th to 9th centuries—an intellectual "Golden Age" in Ireland.[9] The causes were multiple, but two areas can be highlighted. The first was the importation of new or previously unavailable works into Ireland. Chief among these were the works of classical grammarians, such as Charisius, Diomedes, and Pompeius—many of which likely came by way of Irish foundations on the Continent, such as Bobbio.[10] Material also arrived from Spain, whether directly or via intermediaries. As well as works by Isidore and a number of his near-contemporaries, such as Julian of Toledo, this included an important and influential computistical collection that reached Ireland by the 630s.[11] The second factor was the various controversies that engulfed the churches in Ireland in the 7th century—uppermost among these being the Paschal Controversy. As Ó Corráin observed, these controversies "forced the churchmen to give deep thought to themselves and their institutions [… They] led to a rapid—one might say urgent—cultivation of a higher learning."[12]

That an "Isidorian revolution" took place in Ireland in the 7th century is indisputable. What remains contested is when this revolution truly began. The problem is two-fold. Firstly, many of the works that draw on Isidore's writings are difficult to date precisely; that some exist in different versions and recensions only adds to the complexities. Secondly, it is not always clear whether a particular author is drawing on Isidore directly or via intermediaries, such as glossaries or word-lists. The surviving manuscripts demonstrate that parts at least of the Etymologiae were circulating in Ireland by the mid-7th century, and it is equally clear that a range of Isidore's writings were being drawn on by that century's end[13]; more difficult to ascertain is what was going on in the interim.

It is emblematic that the earliest use of Isidore in Ireland is likely by an author to whom the adjective "enigmatic" is invariably attached: Virgilius Maro Grammaticus.[14] Almost everything about him remains obscure, from his own origins to the purpose of his writings.[15] For a long time, Virgilius was believed to have been from Gaul, perhaps Toulouse; now he is held widely, but not universally, to have been Irish or at least to have been active in Ireland.[16] His two works—the Epitomae and the Epistolae—look on the surface to be conventional grammatical treatises, very much in the tradition of commentaries on Donatus and other classical grammarians.[17] Yet Virgilius's writings go far beyond the subject matter of traditional grammars and abound in bizarre vocabulary, puns and word-play, curious etymologies, and the concatenation of fictional—and often outlandishly named—authorities. Virgilius's discussions are interspersed with asides and digressions—most famously his account of the fourteen-day argument between Terrentius and Galbungus over the vocative of "ego"[18]—and he seems to delight in obscure, arcane, and probably personally invented knowledge. What Virgilius was up to has occasioned considerable debate. Were his works elaborate parodies and extended in-jokes?[19] Were they a call for a multiplicity of views and independence of thought at a time when intellectual horizons were narrowing?[20] Or were they simply the work of a teacher attempting to liven up a potentially dull and difficult subject—"like teaching Latin in a pub," as Ó Cróinín put it?[21]

The sheer creative exuberance of Virgilius's writings makes it difficult to trace sources and influences—direct verbal dependencies are almost entirely absent, and debts can be heavily disguised.[22] Despite this, there is a sustained, albeit implicit, engagement with Isidore. Like Isidore, Virgilius showed a particular interest in etymology, believing the origin of words to be a key to their meaning and a route to a deeper understanding. Although Virgilius employed his own methodologies, some of his etymologies look to be derived from or responding to Isidore.[23]

[23] The debt to Isidore was first identified by Thomas Stangl, Virgiliana. Die grammatischen Schriften des Galliers Virgilius Maro (Munich: 1891), 128 n. 16. These findings were then expanded by Max Manitius, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich: 1911), 1:121.

> Virgilius Maro Grammaticus, Epitoma 11: "Sea" is thought by Latin speakers to derive from bitterness, by Hebrew speakers it is called "gathering of waters."[24]
> Isidore, Etymologiae 13.14.1: A sea is a general gathering of waters, for every confluence of waters, whether they are salt or fresh, is, loosely, a "sea" […] But strictly speaking something is called sea because its waters are bitter.[25]

Taken individually, the similarities between Isidore and Virgilius are suggestive but not compelling.[26] However, as Herren notes, "many of the etymologies of [Virgilius] have parallels in specific parts of specific books of Isidore […] the parallels are not random."[27] Yet for Virgilius, Isidore was neither a definitive source nor an indisputable authority. Though never mentioned by name, Isidore was an author to be engaged with and to be challenged; perhaps, as Polara has suggested, he was even an author to be parodied. For example, in book 5.31.1 of the Etymologiae, Isidore defined night as follows[28]:

> Night (nox) is so called from "harming" (nocere), because it impairs the eyes. It has the light of the moon and stars, so as not to be without adornment, and so that it may comfort all those who work at night, and so that it may have sufficient light for certain living creatures that cannot tolerate sunlight.[29]

By contrast, when Virgilius offered an etymology for "night" he suggested that "those who work at night" might not deserve such comforts:

[29] "Nox a nocendo dicta, eo quod oculis noceat. Quae idcirco lunae ac siderum lucem habet, ne indecora esset, et ut consolaretur omnes nocte operantes, et ut quibusdam animantibus, quae lucem solis ferre non possunt ad sufficientiam temperaretur."

> "Night" is so called because it interferes with human affairs or because during it thieves and brigands find opportunity to injure others.[30]

Isolating humour or parody in medieval texts is no easy thing, but Virgilius's jokes—if such they were—presuppose extensive familiarity with the Etymologiae on the part of his audience. At the very least, Virgilius's writings show an author engaged deeply with Isidore and his work.

When was Virgilius writing? Perhaps inevitably, this is no easy question to answer. Virgilius's works were known to Aldhelm of Malmesbury (see below) by 690, but he may have been cited earlier in an Irish computistical compilation—the so-called Sirmond collection.[31] This comprised computistical material deriving from Spain (see above) and works produced or circulating in Ireland; eventually it would travel to England, where it formed the basis of Bede's own computus.[32] The Sirmond collection now survives in—or, perhaps better, can be reconstructed from—a number of Continental manuscripts, dating from the 8th century onwards. One item common to many of these manuscripts is a dating clause, calculable as 658.[33] If this were the date that the Sirmond collection itself was compiled, as Ó Cróinín has argued, then Virgilius could be assigned safely to the mid-7th century. If, however, the date applies only to the item in which the clause is found—an item that does not draw on Virgilius—then such certainty is impossible.[34] The waters are muddied further by the recent discovery of a new Sirmond manuscript: Bremen, Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek, msc 0046.[35] This contains an item with another dating clause, calculable as 699, pointing, perhaps, to a number of stages in the production of the Sirmond collection, spread out over several decades.[36]

[34] Doubts about whether the 658 date applies to the compilation of the whole collection are discussed by Immo Warntjes, ed. and trans., The Munich Computus: Text and Translation. Irish Computistics between Isidore of Seville and the Venerable Bede and Its Reception in Carolingian Times (Stuttgart: 2010), LXXX–LXXI, n. 217.

[35] Immo Warntjes, "A Newly Discovered Prologue of AD 699 to the Easter Table of Victorius of Aquitaine in an Unknown Sirmond Manuscript," Peritia 21 (2010), 257.

For our purposes, these chronological uncertainties are doubly frustrating. As well as citing the work of Virgilius, a number of items in the Sirmond collection draw explicitly, and often verbatim, on Isidore, particularly the Etymologiae but also De natura rerum.[37] If the original compilation of the Sirmond collection could be dated to 658 or thereabouts it would be precious evidence for the early reception of Isidore's writings. That parts at least of the Etymologiae were being copied in Ireland by this time (see above) suggests that such a date is not implausible. The likely cultural milieu of the Sirmond collection may add further weight to this dating. The collection has connections to a productive and influential scholarly circle active in the southern midlands of Ireland across the middle decades of the 7th century.[38] This circle included Cummian, author of a relentlessly learned letter on the Paschal Controversy (c.633); the so-called Irish Augustine, author of De mirabilibus sacrae scripturae (655); Manchianus, teacher of the Irish Augustine and abbot of Men Drochait (d. 652); Laidcend mac Baíth Bandaig of Cluain Ferta Mo Lua (d. 661); Banbannus (d. 687?); as well as the otherwise unidentified Brecannus and Bercanus, son of Áed.[39] Virgilius, too, likely had links to this group.[40]

This scholarly circle looks to have played a role in the early adoption and dissemination of Isidorian knowledge. The old idea that Laidcend drew on Isidore's De ortu et obitu patrum in his abridgement of Gregory the Great's Moralia in Iob has by now been effectively dismantled.[41] That Laidcend did know something of Isidore's writings is demonstrated in another of his works, the so-called Lorica Gildae or Suffragare trinitatis unitas—a protective prayer invoking God's aid and assistance.[42] Sections of this poem, particularly those concerning the different parts of the body, show a debt in terms of vocabulary to the Etymologiae. For example, in the extract below, the italicised words all occur in book 11.1:

> For teeth, tongue, mouth, uvula, throat, windpipe, underside of the tongue, nape, forehead, cartilage, neck; oh merciful one, stay near for protection.[43]

Though not all the vocabulary used by Laidcend was uncommon, the consistent overlap with the vocabulary of the Etymologiae throughout the Lorica suggests that Isidore was a key source. Indeed, the thematic structure of the Etymologiae must have made it ideally suited to aid the composition of list-poems like the Lorica. Less clear is whether Laidcend knew the Etymologiae directly or was relying on glossaries—his only debt to Isidore seems to be vocabulary. For what it is worth, many of Laidcend's Isidorian borrowings can be found in the St Gallen fragments discussed above, so direct inspiration is possible, even if not provable.

Also connected with this southern midlands circle may have been the composers of some or all of the interrelated texts known as the Hisperica famina—that is, the Western Sayings or Latinacious Speakifications, to use Andy Orchard's delightfully fitting rendering.[44] The recherché vocabulary used in these texts has become infamous—alongside obscure and perhaps self-consciously pretentious synonyms for simple Latin words, the "Faminators" employed Greek and Greek-derived words, coined new hybrids of Latin and Hebrew, and used frequent metonymy.[45] Almost everything about the Hisperica famina has been the subject of debate. Most would accept them as the product of an Irish cultural milieu and of a mid-7th-century date, but beyond this it is hard to go. They evoke a world of wandering scholars and itinerant masters, of flyting, competitive erudition, and learning never worn lightly. With their opaque and over-inflated vocabulary, they read like parodies of the simple colloquies that formed the basis of elementary Latin instruction—but parodies to what end?[46] Were they "models for the ornamentation of style," as Herren has suggested, or a part of an Insular enigmata tradition, their very obscurity the key to their didacticism?[47] Whatever their purpose, the Hisperica famina show a clear debt to the writings of Isidore. The Etymologiae, in particular, were a key source for vocabulary—indeed, in certain instances words from specific sections of Isidore's text were deployed in order ("A" text, lines 44–52):

> This elegant assemblage of scholars is dazzling, – > now for leagues of lapsed time > we have not seen a phalanx equal to it, > nor through future regions of the temporal sphere > shall we behold a throng to match its refulgent reputation.
> But nearby there lurks a fearful serpent > which will wound this band with its deadly strike, > unless they beseech the ruler of the vast universe > to release the flourishing troop from mortal peril.[48]

This may be compared with Isidore, Etymologiae 9.3.46–64:

> Properly we speak of a phalanx of Macedonians, a "band" of Gauls, and a "legion" of our forces [...] It is called a column when an army marches.[49]

Whether the Etymologiae were drawn on directly or via glossaries is unclear. In contrast to Isidore, the Faminators had a tendency to flatten meaning and to neglect the nuances that separated near-synonyms.[50] Such might be explained by the use of glossaries, where definitions of words would necessarily be short and simplified.[51] This might also account for seeming mistakes or confusions of meaning. Thus "proritus" (classical Latin "pruritus"—"itching") is used in the Hisperica famina to mean, apparently, "star" or "burning." The error—or shift in meaning—looks to have arisen from a misunderstanding of Isidore's definition: "Prurigo is so called from burning up and flaming" (4.8.7).[52] A glossary that simply offered "Prurigo: perurens, ardens" on the basis of this definition would go some way towards explaining the Faminators' usage.[53]

[49] "Proprie autem Macedonum phalanx, Gallorum caterva, nostra legio dicitur. [...] Agmen dicitur cum exercitus iter facit."

Evidence for the use of other works by Isidore in the Hisperica famina is minimal—De natura rerum may have been drawn on, as may De differentiis verborum.[54] Herren has suggested the Synonyma may have inspired something of the style adopted by the Faminators, particularly their painstaking avoidance of repeated words.[55] In the absence of direct borrowing this is beyond proof; indeed, a recent survey of the transmission of the Synonyma denied that they were known at all in Ireland in the 7th or 8th centuries.[56]

If the religious institutions of the south midlands were amongst the earliest adopters of Isidorian knowledge in Ireland, enthusiasm for his writings quickly spread. By the end of the 7th century his works were, for example, a key intellectual resource at the Irish foundation on Iona. In De locis sanctis, a description of the Holy Land based on the travels of the Frankish bishop, Arculf, Adomnán, abbot of Iona from 679 to 704, drew on at least two of Isidore's work—the Etymologiae and De natura rerum.[57] Information from Isidore allowed Adomnán to fill out his descriptions, to provide history and detail, and, perhaps, to check the veracity of Arculf's account.[58] Chapter thirty of book 2 is particularly indebted to Isidore,[59] for example:

> Isidore, Etymologiae 15.2.37: A lighthouse is a very tall tower which the Greeks and Latins in common have named "lighthouse" from its particular use, because thanks to its signal of flames it may be seen from far off by sailors. Ptolemy is said to have constructed such a lighthouse near Alexandria for eight hundred talents of gold. Its function was to show a light for ships sailing at night, in order to make known the channels and the entrance to the port, so that sailors would not be deceived in the darkness and run onto the rocks.[61]

As can be seen, Adomnán has first applied Isidore's general etymology of lighthouse to that at Alexandria in particular and then partly copied verbatim and partly paraphrased Isidore's account of the Pharos—an approach Adomnán adopts throughout the whole of the chapter.

[61] "Farum turris est maxima quam Graeci ac Latini in commune ex ipsius rei usu farum appellaverunt, eo quod flammarum indicio longe videatur a navigantibus, qualem Ptolomaeus iuxta Alexandriam construxisse octingentis talentis traditur. Usus eius est nocturno navium cursu ignes ostendere, ad pronuntianda vada portusque introitus, ne decepti tenebris navigantes in scopulos incidant."

We also find Isidore being used in the monastic classroom on Iona.[62] The so-called Explanatio Iunii Philargyrii or Explanationes in Bucolica—two versions of which survive—is a short commentary on Virgil's Eclogues. Alongside extracts from the work of Junius Philargyrius, the Explanatio contains classroom notes based on a teacher's exposition of the Eclogues. A number of glosses in Old Irish—dateable to c.700—together with a reference to one "Adamnanus" make it probable that the teacher in question was Abbot Adomnán himself. Isidore's Etymologiae were one of the resources drawn on to interpret and understand Virgil. Thus, when discussing Eclogues 3.8, "I know who was with you while the goats looked askance," the Explanatio quotes Etymologiae 12.1.14 verbatim: "the he-goat is a lascivious animal and always eager to mate; his eyes look sideways on account of wantonness, whence he has taken his name, for according to Suetonius, hirqui are the corners of the eyes."[63]

Some measure of the authority Isidore's writings had attained by the 8th century is provided by another work with Ionan connections—the Collectio canonum Hibernensis. This work dates to the late 7th or the 8th century and, according to a colophon in one manuscript, at least parts of it were the work of Ruben of Dairinis (d. 725) and Cú Chuimne of Iona (d. 747).[64] It now survives in two recensions—A and B—whose relationship with each other and with any putative original version is complex and not yet fully understood. Despite its title, the Collectio is far more ambitious in scope than a straightforward canon law collection. Rather, it is an attempt, in Maurice Sheeley's words, "to draw up a blue-print for all aspects of Christian living."[65] The key innovation of the Collectio was its use of authorities. Where earlier collections of canon law had drawn almost exclusively on papal decretals and synodal canons, the Collectio employed a wider range of materials—the Bible, writings of the Church Fathers and other ecclesiastical authors, along with penitentials, monastic rules, and other Christian literature.[66] Isidore was amongst these new authorities, with at least five of his works utilised—the Etymologiae, De ecclesiasticis officiis, the Chronicon, the Sententiae, and the Quaestiones in uetus Testamentum—along with a number of pseudo-Isidorian works.[67] Of the two recensions of the Collectio, B makes the most frequent use of Isidore, but both recensions often open sections with an Isidorian etymology. For example, book 1 of recension A opens with a chapter entitled "Concerning the name of the bishop":

> Isidore: However, the episcopacy, as a certain of the wise says, is the name of a burden not an honour. It should be noted that bishops are named "sacerdotes" and also priests are held to have the name "sacerdotes." Similarly, it should be known that bishops and priests took their names in the New Law, however, sacerdotes were named both in the Old and the New Law.[68]

The italicised text is a direct quotation from De ecclesiasticis officiis 2.5.8, and the underlined material a paraphrase and adaptation. The rest of the material may be drawing on sections of the Etymologiae, such as 7.12, but seems otherwise to be original to the Collectio.

Our discussion has so far focused on texts that can be closely located or to which an attribution of Irish authorship is relatively uncontroversial. There exists, however, a large corpus of anonymous exegetical writings that may be the work of Irish authors. These texts were first identified by Bischoff, who argued that they contained "irischen Symptomen"—that is, clusters of particular features that are not in themselves unique to Irish works but which Bischoff believed to be diagnostic when occurring together or in high frequency.[69] Bischoff's thesis has not been without its critics, nor have all his attributions been accepted.[70] It is difficult also to use Bischoff's methods to distinguish texts produced in Ireland from texts produced by Irish scholars on the Continent or by those trained by Irish masters. Nevertheless, most scholars would accept that at least some of the texts identified by Bischoff can be safely attributed to an Irish cultural milieu. Only a limited number of these anonymous commentaries have yet been edited, so assessing their debt to Isidore and the role his writings played in their composition remains problematic.[71] One conclusion can be drawn, however. The culmination of this early Irish exegetical activity was the anonymous text that Bischoff labelled "das Bibelwerk."[72] This was a commentary on all the books of the Bible—a monumental undertaking—produced in Ireland in the second half of the 8th century. The compilers quoted Isidore at length—at excessive length, Bischoff felt—and drew on at least six of his works: the Etymologiae, De natura rerum, De ecclesiasticis officiis, De ortu et obitu patrum, Quaestiones in uetus testamentum, and the Chronicon.[73] Most significantly, the whole work opens with the second and third chapters of book 6 of the Etymologiae.[74] That is, by the middle of the 8th century, Isidore's authority in Ireland was such that his writings were the obvious starting point for a commentary as ambitious and important as "das Bibelwerk."

As the writings of Isidore were stimulating a cultural efflorescence in Ireland, so, too, was England seeing the first buds of its own intellectual flowering.

Here, initial stimulus was less the importation of new works or the fervour of ecclesiastical controversy and more the arrival in 669–70 of two inspirational teachers: Theodore and Hadrian. The former, born in Tarsus in the Hellenic Roman diocese of Cilicia and educated in Antioch and Constantinople, was the papally appointed archbishop of Canterbury; the latter, of North African origin, would become abbot of the monastery of St Peter and Paul in Canterbury.[75] Both men were fluent in Greek and Latin, and the school that they founded at Canterbury transformed the intellectual culture of Anglo-Saxon England. The Venerable Bede described the school in glowing terms:

> because both of them were extremely learned in sacred and secular literature, they attracted a crowd of students into whose minds they daily poured the streams of wholesome learning. They gave their hearers instruction not only in the books of Holy Scripture but also in the art of metre, astronomy, and ecclesiastical computation. As evidence of this, some of their students still survive who know Latin and Greek just as well as their native tongue.[76]

No writings by Hadrian are now extant, and little can be attributed directly to Theodore.[77] What do survive, albeit at several removes, are notes of their teachings and pronouncements, written down by their students—the most famous of these being the various collections of penitential decrees transmitted under Theodore's name.[78] More significant for our purposes, however, are the brief biblical commentaries and glossaries that preserve some of Theodore's and Hadrian's teachings. What this material demonstrates is the central role of the works of Isidore—the Etymologiae in particular—in the Canterbury classroom. As Porter observed, "the Etymologiae was not just a major interpretative tool at Canterbury, but in fact it looks very much like the reference book of first choice for practically any question."[79]

Of the biblical commentaries, only the first commentary on the Pentateuch; supplementary commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, and the Gospels; and the Second Commentary on the Gospels have yet been published.[80] Though Isidore is not mentioned by name in these commentaries, his etymologies inform a number of the discussions.[81] For example, the reference to a razor ("nouacula") in Numbers 6:5 is explained thus:

> Razor is so-called because it 'renews' the skin; it is the breadth of the fingers and is shaped thus[82]

The italicised words are quoted directly from the Etymologiae 20.13.4—though Isidore states a razor renews the face rather than the skin. In other cases, Isidorian etymologies look to lie behind a comment or interpretation, even if no vocabulary is borrowed directly. Thus, when discussing Abimelech of Gerar, the Canterbury commentary notes:

> Abimelech the king sent: that is, "abimelech" is a title, just like "pharaoh" among the Egyptians, or 'Caesar' among the Romans, or "Augustus," as the text subsequently makes clear.[83]

In the Etymologiae 7.6.43, Isidore stated:

> Pharaoh is the name not of a person, but of a position of rank, just as among us kings are called "Augustus"[84]

[84] "Pharao nomen est non hominis, sed honoris, sicut et apud nos Augusti appellantur reges."

Lengthier quotations from the Etymologiae are made on at least two occasions. The discussion of Paradise in the Genesis commentary is taken directly from Etymologiae 14.3.2–4, with some additional alternative information about its location, probably from Greek sources, added at the end.[85] Likewise, the consideration of the ephod in the first commentary on the Pentateuch draws largely verbatim on Etymologiae 16.13.2 in a discussion of diamonds, with the exploration of the ephod itself seemingly dependent on Eucherius of Lyon's Instructiones.[86]

Though the Canterbury biblical commentaries make use of Isidore, his works are by no means central. To understand the paramount importance of Isidore's writings to the school at Canterbury we need to turn to the glossaries. Of these, the most significant are the Leiden Glossary and its related texts.[87] The Leiden Glossary comprises forty-eight chapters, two of which (26 and 27) gloss words derived from works by Isidore—De ecclesiasticis officiis and De natura rerum, respectively. Chapter 47—headed "Item alia"—also includes a number of lemmata from the Etymologiae.[88] More significantly, a large number of the interpretamenta—that is, the definitions of the words—are drawn from the Etymologiae; Porter identified some 142 examples.[89] In some cases, the Etymologiae are quoted verbatim or near verbatim:

> Sicera: is any drink apart from wine that can inebriate a person. Although its name is Hebrew, it still has a Latin sound because it is made from the juice of grain or fruits.[90]

This is effectively the opening of Etymologiae 20.3.16, with a few spelling variants. In other cases, Isidore's etymologies are stripped down to their barest essentials. Thus:

> Leiden Glossary 2.13: Library: a depository of books[91]
> Etymologiae 6.3.1: A library takes its name from Greek, because books are deposited there.[92]

The debt is deeper than a simple borrowing of etymologies. The evidence from the Leiden Glossary implies that the Etymologiae suggested which words in a text to gloss. That is, the Etymologiae were not turned to when a difficult word was encountered in a text but instead provided guidance as to which words would repay further attention.[93] On a number of occasions, successive lemmata are glossed from the same section of the Etymologiae:

> Leiden Glossary 1.100–01: Proconsolaris: in the place of consuls because they were substitutes for consuls
> Procuratores: because they discharged duties in the place of curators[94]
> Etymologiae 9.3.8: Proconsuls were substitutes for consuls, and were called proconsuls because they would function in place of consuls, as a procurator does in place of a curator, that is, an agent.[95]

Similarly, "coenobium" and "monasterium," successive entries in chapter 2, are both glossed from the same passage in 15.4.5–6.[96]

Isidore's writings, the Etymologiae in particular, were clearly a key intellectual resource at Canterbury. An epitome of the Etymologiae, now surviving in a Frankish manuscript written around 800, sheds further light on how Isidore's text was used.[97] The original exemplar for this epitome was clearly Anglo-Saxon, for it incorporates a number of glosses in Old English, dateable on linguistic grounds to *c.*700, along with Insular orthography and abbreviations.[98]

Where it was produced is uncertain but Canterbury, or a centre closely connected to it, is most likely. The epitome draws on the whole of the Etymologiae—in some cases bringing together information from a number of different places in the text—and its compiler, in Lapidge's words, basically "showed sound judgment in what he included and what he omitted."[99] A few mistakes caused by injudicious précising or copying did creep in, however. Even the most otherworldly monk would be puzzled by the statement that the Lacedaemonians, "fearing that they would lose any hope of offspring because of the prolongation of the conflict [...] commanded that their maidens should lie with the women remaining at home."[100] This epitome was not the only one in circulation; a number of later glossaries point to another, different in composition and more fully glossed in Old English than the one now extant.[101] The existence of these different epitomes led Rusche to suggest that such abridgements "may have been the standard form of transmission for Isidore's text in England as early as the late seventh century."[102]

The most famous alumnus of the school at Canterbury was Aldhelm of Malmesbury (d. 709). Although he received his early education at the hands of an Irishman and spent time on Iona, it was his time at Canterbury that was central to his intellectual development—or so he himself believed.[103] Aldhelm produced an extensive body of writing, from riddles to treatises in praise of virginity and chastity, and these demonstrate his familiarity with at least five of Isidore's works—De ecclesiasticis officiis, De natura rerum, De ortu et obitu patrum, the Etymologiae, and the Synonyma. [104]

Aldhelm's writings are indebted to Isidore both in terms of content and style. Isidore's De ortu et obitu patrum, for example, supplied Aldhelm with much of the information that he incorporated into his tituli on the Twelve Apostles (Carmen Ecclesiasticum IV).[105] De Ortu likewise supplied biographical information for Adlhelm's two treatises on virginity. In these examples,

Aldhelm simply incorporated information he had quarried from Isidore's writings. In other cases, he cited Isidore verbatim, albeit without acknowledging his source. Thus, in his letter to King Geraint of Dumnonia, concerning the Easter question and ecclesiastical unity, Adlhelm drew on De ecclesiasticiis officiis 2.4.3–4 when discussing the tonsure:

> Indeed, the tiara among the ancients was set upon the head of priests; it was round made of twisted fine linen, and was in the shape of a half sphere, and this is signified in the shaved part of the head. A crown, however, is a circular golden perimeter which girds the head of kings. And so each sign is expressed on the head of clerics, in words of Peter "But you are a chosen generation, a kingly priesthood." This method of tonsuring and shaving is a sign that vices are trimmed back and that we are shorn of the hair of our flesh as though of crimes.[106]

Here, Aldhelm altered the overall order of his material, giving the lengthy description from 2.4.4 (in italics above) before adapting Isidore's pun on "criminibus" ("crimes") and "crinibus" ("hairs") (underlined above). Earlier in this section, Aldhelm had also drawn briefly on 2.4.1, including, interestingly, Isidore's own statement "unless I am mistaken" ("nisi fallor").

Isidore also contributed to Aldhelm's distinctive diction. In certain cases, particular sections from the Etymologiae look to have provided both vocabulary and overall structuring principles for Aldhelm's writing. For example:

> Aldhelm, De Virginitate 60: I shall try with artistry to adorn the renown of this same chastity, with Christ's co-operation, in the heroic measures of hexameter verse, and, as if the rhetorical foundation-stones were now laid and the walls of prose were built up, so I shall—trusting in heavenly support—build a sturdy roof with trochaic slates and dactylic tiles of metre.[107]

Unlike the Faminators, Aldhelm does not look to have "flattened" the meanings of words derived from Isidore. Though Aldhelm did use near-synonyms from Isidore to provide elegant variation, he also used differences of meaning as a method of structuring and developing passages.[109]

As well as information and vocabulary, Aldhelm took from Isidore a method for gaining knowledge and insight—etymologising. As Howe summarises, "the characteristics of a thing or creature should not be divorced from its name and etymology, because together they form a unified body of knowledge."[110] Such can be seen clearly in Aldhelm's riddles or Enigmata. Isidore was certainly a source of information for these riddles—for example, Aldhelm repeats Isidore's mistake about the minotaur, taking "mino" to be a general term for "man."[111] More important, however, was Isidore's influence on the pedagogic purpose of the riddles. One curious feature of Aldhelm's riddles is that the "solution" to the riddle is given as its title—seemingly defeating the purpose of the exercise. Moreover, Aldhelm's Enigmata are not, on the face of it, particularly enigmatic.[112] Yet this misses the point of what Aldhelm was doing. The thing that was to be solved, the meaning to be unravelled, was not the text of the riddle, but its title. The body of the riddle was a means of better understanding the title word, a means of holding it up to scrutiny, of interrogating it, and gaining greater insight.[113]

As Theodore and Hadrian were transforming learning in the south, an equally fruitful—and in many ways far more influential—period was beginning in Northumbria. The Venerable Bede (d. 735) was the most famous product of this period, but the so-called "Northumbrian Renaissance" was broader. Alongside the poet Lutting of Lindisfarne can be placed the considerable hagiographical output from Northumbria in this period—the anonymous Vita Cuthberti (*c.*699), the Whitby Vita Gregorii (post 704), Stephen of Ripon's Vita Wilfridi (*c.*710–20), and the anonymous Vita Ceolfridi (post 716).[114] That the writings of Isidore played a part in this renaissance is clear, but how the Spaniard was viewed and the value placed on his works in 8th-century Northumbria have been the subject of considerable debate.

Though Isidore was used in works by some of Bede's contemporaries—the anonymous Vita Cuthberti, for example, quotes from De ecclesiasticis officiis[115]—the best evidence for Isidore's reception in Northumbria comes from Bede's own output. Though Bede's historical and hagiographical works are best known, his writings covered a much broader range embracing exegesis, figures of speech and tropes, metrics, geography, cosmography, and the computus. These writings show Bede to have been familiar with at least eight of Isidore's works—the Chronicon, De differentiis verborum, De ecclesiasticis officiis, De natura rerum, De ortu et obitu patrum, the Etymologiae, Quaestiones in uetus Testamentum, and the Sententiae.[116]

Tracing Bede's specific debts to Isidore presents particular problems. Firstly, Bede tended not to refer by name to the authorities that he drew on. He did devise a system of marginal annotations for a number of his commentaries that indicated which particular author he was making use of at any given point, but he restricted it to Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory the Great, and

Jerome.[117] Likewise, though Bede did cite Isidore directly—using Etymologiae 16.36.13, "A cadus is a Greek amphora containing three urns," to interpret Luke 16:6, for example[118]—he had a tendency to put Isidorian etymologies into his own words.[119] Secondly, though most of Bede's works are now available in modern editions the identification of the sources employed is often partial and incomplete. Fortunately, recent English translations of Bede's works offer more comprehensive lists. These demonstrate just how important Isidore was for Bede: he was the third most used author in In principium Genesis, after Augustine and Jerome, and the fourth in In Ezram et Neemiam, after Augustine, Gregory, and Jerome.[120]

Although Bede drew on Isidore throughout his writings, he was particularly indebted to him early in his career. Isidore's De natura rerum was one of the key inspirations behind two of Bede's early works—De natura rerum and De temporibus. Effectively, Bede separated off the opening chapters of Isidore's De natura rerum and expanded their scope—drawing in particular on material from the Sirmond collection—to produce De temporibus. For his De natura rerum Bede expanded material from the rest of Isidore's De natura rerum, adding information from Pliny and a number of other sources, while excising the more allegorical elements of the Spaniard's work.[121] De temporibus closes with a chronicle arranged according to the Six Ages of the World—the Chronica minora—for which Isidore's own Chronica maiora served as a key source. Bede does quote verbatim from Isidore's chronicle in the Chronica minora but tends to modify his source. In particular, Bede excised nearly all references to classical paganism and to secular philosophy.[122] For example:

He was wild with greed, cruelty, and excess, and, elevating himself among the gods, ordered that a statue of Jupiter be set up in the Temple of Jerusalem under his name. At the same time, Matthew, the first Apostle, wrote his Gospel in Judea.[126]

Bede may have removed some of these references out of a desire for brevity—another thing he could have learned from Isidore.[127] That he was prepared to describe Thales as a physician but not Socrates as a philosopher suggests, however, more ideological motivations.[128]

What did Bede make of Isidore? Much turns on a letter written by Cuthbert, later abbot of Wearmouth-Jarrow, describing Bede's final days.[129] According to Cuthbert, Bede remained the solicitous teacher to the end:

> During those days there were two pieces of work worthy of record, besides the lessons which he gave us every day and his chanting of the Psalter, which he desired to finish: the gospel of St. John, which he was turning

What Bede was doing with or to Isidore's De natura rerum remains unclear. Was Bede producing corrections or emendations to Isidore's work, removing that which was not true so that his students would not be misled?[131] Such a reading accords well with the suspicion, long held by many scholars, that Bede did not altogether approve of Isidore and was sceptical of the merits of his work. Though early in his career Bede had been indebted to Isidore, in his maturity he grew wary of Isidore's errors and tried to call out mistakes where he could.[132]

However, recent work suggests this supposed hostility has been overplayed. Returning to an earlier scholarly position, McCready argued that Cuthbert's letter should be read as a describing a dying Bede compiling extracts from De natura rerum—and, possibly, translating them.[133] Perhaps the results would have resembled the glossed epitomes of the Etymologiae discussed above. Nor was Isidore the only author whose errors were called out by Bede—Jerome was similarly criticised on occasion.[134] As Kendall and Wallis suggest, it was not that Bede was especially critical of Isidore in his later years, rather that in his maturity "he had enough experience to realise the greatest doctors were fallible [...] and [must be] corrected when shown to be wrong."[135] This reassessment accords well with changing scholarly attitudes towards Bede. He is no longer seen simply as the humble transmitter of Patristic wisdom but as a scholar confident in his own abilities and, by his later years, secure in his own authority.[136]

If it remains uncertain what Bede was doing on his deathbed, the import of Cuthbert's letter is clear. Bede could not ignore Isidore; even as he was dying, he had to engage with Isidore's scholarship—whether to correct it or to make excerpts from it. That Bede was making a translation from the Gospel of John at the same time only serves to underline Isidore's importance.

4 Conclusion

The question of what British and Irish authors gained from the encyclopaedic writings of Isidore of Seville answers itself. His works put them in touch with wider worlds—cultural, historical, and geographical. He could act as a bridge between the ancient, classical past and the medieval, Christian present, between the Mediterranean Sea and the islands of the Northern Ocean. To those grappling with the alien lands and customs of the Bible, Isidore could act as a guide. His writings could likewise unlock complex and intractable texts and show how meaning could spring forth from words when their origins and derivations were understood.[137] But Isidore's writings provided more than just information. Works such as the Etymologiae and the Synonyma offered up new linguistic possibilities to receptive audiences. Whatever one makes of the word play of Virgilius and the Faminators or the complex, interlaced periods of Aldhelm's prose, they were the product of minds that delighted in the potentials of language, that felt keenly "the allure of Latin when newly learned."[138]

CHAPTER 16

Isidore of Seville and the Formation of Medieval Computus

Immo Warntjes

1 Introduction

Isidore of Seville holds a prominent place in the history of Western science. Roman science had been based on Greek authorities.[1] With the fall of the Western Roman Empire in the 5th century came the loss of Greek language skills. Key scientific texts, like Ptolemy's Almagest for astronomy and Euclid's Elements for mathematics, only became available to the Latin West through translations from Arabic or the original Greek in what is termed the Renaissance of the 12th century.[2] Boethius, advisor to the Ostrogothic King Theoderic in Ravenna in the early 6th century, tried to salvage as much Greek learning as possible (particularly in mathematics, music, and philosophy), but his effort was cut short by the wrath of the king, who sentenced him to death for high treason in AD 524.[3] His mathematica started to flourish in what became known as the Carolingian Renaissance in the 9th century, as did more philosophical works by Martianus Capella, Macrobius, Calcidius, and others, which included many thought-provoking scientific ideas.[4] The intervening period, the 7th and 8th centuries, was strongly influenced (though not dominated) by Isidorian thought.

The western Mediterranean of the 6th and early 7th centuries can well be characterised by Huizinga's famous term as the "autumn" of late classical culture,[5] and, conversely, less so as the spring or awakening of a distinctively medieval approach to learning (this attribute is most appropriately given to 7th-century insular, if not Irish, culture). This is best illustrated by the cases of Cassiodorus and Isidore, who served as lapides angulares, as cornerstones between old Roman and new Christian science. Cassiodorus was a contemporary of Boethius but was more diplomatic in his political dealings, serving as a high-ranking official both Theorderic and his grandson Athalaric. After a long spell in Constantinople, he retired to his famous foundation, the monastery of Vivarium in Calabria.[6] There, he wrote his famous Institutiones, a guide to what he considered proper monastic behaviour and education.[7] Tellingly, the second book, on monastic education, followed closely the very recent concept of the septem artes liberales, popularised by Martianus Capella. These seven liberal arts included arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy in its scientific strand, the quadrivium. Interestingly, in four, principally early, manuscripts of the Institutiones, a short text entitled Computus paschalis is added to the quadrivium.[8] This tract consists of nine formulae for the determination of calendrical data essential for the calculation of the most important Christian feast, Easter. The nine formulae in question had been translated by Dionysius Exiguus, a contemporary and friend of Cassiodorus, from Greek into Latin in AD 525 and they were adapted to the year AD 562 in Cassiodorus's circle.[9] While the quadrivium remained a rather hollow, purely theoretical educational concept, at least until the mid-9th century, computus soon flourished to become the only applied science of Western Europe. Cassiodorus intentionally paved the way for monasteries to act as the new educational centres, and unintentionally for computus to establish itself as their principal scientific subject.

Isidore's case is very similar; he belonged to the same tradition. The exception is his De natura rerum, which should be considered as the origin of Christian cosmology; but even here the novelty lay not in creating a new genre, but rather in turning a pagan tradition Christian.[10] In his 20-book Etymologiae, Isidore followed more traditional patterns. The first three books outline, in almost the same order, the seven liberal arts of Cassiodorus's Institutiones.[11] Isidore adds to these medicine, law, and chronography in books 4 and 5. From book 6 he turned to Christianity proper, with a section on Easter (De ciclo pascali) as Chapter 17 of this book. Here, in his treatment of Easter, Isidore provided the exact opposite to Cassidorus: Isidore was interested in the definition of key terms and concepts, not in the actual application of algorithms. Still, Isidore started his project within the *c.*200-year-old framework of the artes liberales (first initiated by authors like Martianus Capella in the 5th century), but he moved on to include computus, the science of calculating Easter, as an integral part of his discussion.[12] Computus developed from a side-note of Cassiodorus' Institutiones to an important and integral element in Isidore's Etymologiae.

2 Isidore as a Calendrical Scientist (Etym. 6.17 and Isidore's Easter Table)

Because of Isidore's principal preoccupation with collecting knowledge rather than engaging in its actual application, it is not straightforward to establish how good a scientist, especially in calendrical terms (the focus of this study), he was himself. The key witness in this respect is the Easter table outlined in Etymologiae 6.17. This has puzzled scholars at least since the 18th century.[13]

Continental Europe, in the early Middle Ages, principally knew two different ways of calculating the most important Christian feast, Easter.[14] The first, by Victorius of Aquitaine in AD 457,[15] was commissioned by the papal curia following substantial debate under Pope Leo I. This Roman reckoning competed with one devised in Alexandria, the centre of late antique learning, scientific and otherwise, around the end of the 3rd century. When this Greek reckoning was translated into Latin, again on papal initiative, by Dionysius Exiguus in AD 525,[16] conflict ensued which was resolved only in Charlemagne's day around AD 800. The debate was at its height in Visigothic Spain in Isidore's day.[17] Isidore followed the Alexandrian system, and in his writings there is only the slightest trace of its Victorian rival. But from where did Isidore receive his information about the Alexandrian method?

[17] The key documents for the Easter question in Isidore's time were Leo the monk, Epistola ad Sesuldum (Bruno Krusch, ed., Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie: der 84jährige Ostercyclus und seine Quellen [Leipzig: 1880], 298–302); and Braulio of Zaragoza, Epistola ad Eutropium (= Epistola 22: Luis Riesco Terrero, ed., Epistolario de San Braulio: Introducción, edición crítica y traducción [Seville: 1975], 114–17). A new Isidore worked from a variety of sources, more than the most recent edition of book 6 of the Etymologiae indicates.[18] He certainly knew the Epistola Pascasini, a response by Bishop Paschasinus of Lilybaeum in Sicily to Pope Leo I's enquiry about the controversial Easter of AD 444;[19] Archdeacon/Pope Hilarus's letter to Victorius of Aquitaine, urging him, in the aftermath of the problematic Easter of AD 455, to reconcile Roman with Alexandrian practices; Victorius's response, also in letter format, which served as a prologue to the new Easter table he designed; the Prologus Cyrilli, a text promoting the Alexandrian reckoning, but evidently written later than Cyril of Alexandria's lifetime (†AD 444), presumably in the late 5th century; and the Epistola Cyrilli, which is based on an orginal work by the bishop of Alexandria but, in the main part, was composed in AD 607.

More important for the present study is that Isidore knew Dionysius's works, especially his two letters, to Petronius on the one hand, and Boniface and Bonus on the other. But there is no indication that Isidore had Dionysius's Argumenta and Easter table at hand. Similar to his approach in book 3 on mathematics, Isidore does not record, cite, or even refer to a single calendrical algorithm. Among the list of authorities credited with the composition of an Easter table (Etym. 6.17.1–2), namely Hippolytus of Rome, Eusebius of Ceasarea, Prosper and Victorius of Aquitaine, and Theophilus and Cyril of Alexandria, Dionysius is tellingly absent.[20] And Isidore's Easter table differed markedly from the Dionysiac model. It appears that Dionysius and Isidore (or rather their immediate sources) worked independently from the same or a similar Greek model, like Cyril of Alexandria's Easter table.[21]

Like Cyril's Easter table, the one included by Isidore in his Etymologiae covered a period of 95 years. Isidore considered this a true cycle, though the Alexandrian reckoning is cyclic only after 532 years, a clear indication that Isidore's understanding of matters computistical was quite limited.[22] This leads into the most controversial aspect of Isidore's table: which 95-year period was it supposed to cover? Cyril of Alexandria's Easter table was composed for the period AD 437–531. Dionyisus's table (or its model) continued this to AD 532–626. A certain Felix, like Dionysius working in Italy, provided the next extension, AD 627–721.[23] Isidore compiled his Etymologiae in various stages over a considerable period of time. With his death in AD 636, the Easter table may have been produced before or after the chronological watershed of AD 627.

In his still unsurpassed "Die Einführung des griechischen Paschalritus im Abendland" of 1884, Bruno Krusch proved that Isidore simply copied an existing table for the years AD 532–626.[24] In the new 2012 edition of book 6 of the Etymologiae, César Chaparro Gómez simply worked on the assumption that Isidore copied his information from Dionysius's Easter table of AD 532–626, neglecting the manuscript witnesses in this instance.[25] When the earliest manuscripts are examined, a fairly complex picture emerges, which provides a wonderful and unique insight into the transmission history of the Etymologiae. In fact, Isidore's chapter on Easter appears to be the most indicative for analysing the various transmission stages of this work, because later copyists felt the need to update the table to represent their time of writing. A detailed study of the Easter table in the earliest manuscripts of the Etymologiae will appear elsewhere.[26] It will suffice here to summarise the tentative results of that study:

[21] Isidore, Etymologiae 6.17.2, is explicit that Cyril of Alexandria was his ultimate source: "Cuius quidem rationem beatissimus Cyrillus Alexandriae urbis episcopus in nonaginta quinque annos per quinquies decem novies calculans, quoto Kal. vel luna debeat paschalis sollemnitas celebrari, summa brevitate notavit."

[25] Chaparro Gómez, Isidoro de Sevilla, Etimologías, Libro VI, 189: "Esta largo cuadro de los cinco ciclos de diecinueve años ha sido tomado por Isidoro de Dionys. Exig. pasch. (ML 67, 493 ss.). Está copiado al pie de la letra y, por ello, nos ha servido para corregor las defectuosas lecturas que dieron Arévalo, Lindsay y los posteriores traductores de este libro. Lo que sucede es Isidoro sólo copió una parte del cuadro general de Dionisio, por lo que puede resultar ininteligible. Los errores en los manuscritos son múltiples y algunos ni siquiera aportan dicho calendario."

1. Isidore included in his Etymologiae an Alexandrian Easter table covering the years AD 532–626. He did not work from Dionysius's model, but rather used a Greek or Latin source available in the Iberian Peninsula. One of the characteristic features of Isidore's table seems to have been an unusual sequence of common and embolismic years, reversing the order of common and embolismic years in the 16th and 17th years; since this effectively changes the structure of the 19-year cycle from the Alexandrian 8 + 11 years (ogdoas + hendecas) to two 8-year periods and one of 3 years, this hints at a Latin model.[27]
2. In the years AD 627–45, Isidore's Easter table was updated so that the first 19-year cycle covered the contemporary period AD 627–45; the remaining second to fifth 19-year cycles remained unchanged. This update may be attributed to Braulio of Zaragoza.
3. Outside of the Etymologiae but in Visigothic Spain, the Alexandrian Easter table of AD 532–626 was updated to the subsequent 95-year period, AD 627–721; this updated table was included in the Etymologiae slightly later in a rare recension transmitted through Irish channels. The update may be dated to AD 632, its inclusion to AD 655.
4. Close to the end of the 95-year period of AD 627–721, the note A conditione mundi usque ad hunc nouissimum ciclum computantur anni V̄DCCCCXX was included in some recensions of the Etymologiae. It refers to the year AM 5920 = AD 722.
5. In the period AD 779–97, Isidore's table in the Etymologiae was updated to the 95-year period AD 779–873. This should be connected to the Carolingian educational reforms which accepted and promoted computus as the ultimate science. Towards the end of this period, in the final 19-year cycle of AD 855–73, this table was revised by replacing Isidore's outdated sequence of bissextile years with the correct list for these final 19 years.
6. A thorough investigation of Isidore's Easter table in all 8th- to 10th-century codices of the Etymologiae will doubtlessly reveal many more [27] The 8-year cycle underlies the Easter table of Hyppolitus, whose 112-year table consists of five 16 (2 × 8)-year periods; cf. Eduard Schwartz, "Christliche und jüdische Ostertafeln," Abhandlungen der Königlichen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen, philologisch-historische Klasse, Band 8, Nr. 6 (1905), 29–36; Alden A. Mosshammer, The Easter computus and the origins of the Christian era (Oxford: 2008), 116–23. The 8-year period was well known through the writings of Quintus Julius Hilarianus's Expositum de die paschae et mensis (PL 13, 1105–14: 113).

stages in the transmission of this text. For the table proper and its development, it will be key to include the transmission independent of the Etymologiae. An interesting case in this respect is the Isidorian Easter table in the famous computistical manuscript Milan BA H 150 inf., known as the Bobbio Computus.[28] The data presented match the period AD 798–892.[29] Since, again, this table is not a direct continuation of Isidore's original table (which would be AD 626–721, 722–816, 817–912), it was quite certainly composed during its first 19-year cycle, AD 798–816. This fits nicely the date of composition of the codex itself. Since the first two decades of the 9th century marked a high point in the Carolingian study of computus, an update of Isidore's table at around this time is to be expected.

3 The Formation of Computus—Isidore in Britain and Ireland (Computistical Textbook)

Isidore was deeply steeped in late antique tradition. In educational terms, the late antique approach to learning (most prominently, but not solely, represented by the artes liberales), which still informed the bishop of Seville's thinking, was soon replaced by a vibrant intellectual endeavour under a Christian umbrella, fostered by the rapidly spreading monasteries. While Late Antiquity was drawing to its close in the Iberian Peninsula and Italy, early medieval monastic culture rose in the insular world (Ireland and Britain). Here, learning focused on God's word and work, the principal objective being to understand the written truth and the cosmos. Latin grammar and exegesis became the core subjects, Priscian and Donatus, Jerome and Augustine the essential readings.[30] But these subjects only covered an understanding of the Bible, not of God's creation. A new subject had to be created, which became known by the term "computus." Its core component was the organisation of the liturgical calendar, which was determined by the date of Easter. Easter itself was fixed on the first Sunday after the first full moon after the spring equinox. Thus, the tropical year and the synodic lunar month needed to be modelled mathematically, which was done in the form of the Julian calendar and a 19-year lunar cycle. This focus on the sun and the moon opened computus up to other phenomena connected to the heavenly bodies, and ultimately to all key components necessary to understand God's creation as manifested in the cosmos. The core of computus was therefore calendrical calculations, astronomy and arithmetic its auxiliary sciences, contemplation about God's work its ultimate aim.

[28] Milan BA H 150 inf., 108r–109r (Bobbio, early 9th century).

[29] Cuppo, "Felix of Squillace," 133–36, published this table, indicating that it covers the equivalent 95-year periods AD 608–702, 703–97, 798–892. This is obviously not correct, as the table is not cyclic; the data match only the period AD 798–892.

[30] See the chapter by José Carracedo Fraga in this volume.

As outlined above, calendrical science certainly was not Isidore's main area of interest or expertise. How little did he know, yet he would become one of the founding fathers of computus! As this subject was a new, 7th-century invention, there were no models, no textbooks available. There simply was no Donatus or Priscian for computus. But there was a constant supply of texts from the Iberian Peninsula to Ireland, which brought fundamental works to the insular world. Two channels of transmission were vitally important: (1) the Isidorian material, and (2) the so-called Sirmond group of texts.[31] When exactly Isidore's Etymologiae arrived in Ireland, and in what state (i.e. the full text or only selected books), remains a matter of debate.[32] Certainly, in the second half of the 7th century (whether early or late depends on interpretation) Irish monks actively engaged in a thorough study of the Etymologiae. Which parts of the text could be extracted and pasted together as a substitute for the missing computistical textbook?

The obvious choice would have been to combine the second part of book 5, De temporibus,[33] with 6.17, De ciclo paschali. But some of the material in the astronomy section of book 3 (De astronomia)[34] and book 13 on cosmology[35] also contained relevant information for computistical theory. Traces of this, no doubt, 7th-century endeavour to systematise Isidorian thought into a textbook on time-reckoning can be found in 8th- and 9th-century computistical manuscripts (all, it will be noted, with evident insular connections). One of the prime witnesses is Berlin SBPK Phillipps 1831.[36] In effect, this codex is a collection of key computistical textbooks available at the time of production, around AD 800. It contains Bede's De temporibus of AD 703 and De temporum ratione of AD 725, the Neustrian Dialogue of AD 737, the Computus of AD 757, and the Libellus annalis of AD 793. Sandwiched in this collection are the astronomical section of book 3 of Isidore's Etymologiae and book 13 on cosmology, successively.[37]

[32] The oldest manuscript witnesses of the Etymologiae in Ireland are the famous St Gall fragments, originally binding supports to the codices 150 and 267 of the Stiftsbibliothek. They are from book 11 and date to the mid-7th century, Alban Dold and Johannes Duft, Die älteste irische Handschriften-Reliquie der Stiftsbiblothek St. Gallen mit Texten aus Isidors Etymologien (Beuron: 1955). More generally, see A.E. Anspach, "Das Fortleben Isidors im VII. bis IX. Jahrhundert," in Miscellanea Isidoriana (Rome: 1936), 327–29, 337–38; Bernhard Bischoff, "Die europäische Verbreitung der Werke Isidors von Sevilla," Isidoriana (León: 1961), 317–44; Bengt Löfstedt, Der hibernolateinische Grammatiker Malsachanus (Uppsala: 1965), 50–51; Marina Smyth, "Isidore of Seville and early Irish cosmography," Cambridge Medieval Celtic Studies 14 (1987), 69–102; Michael W. Herren, "On the earliest Irish acquaintance with Isidore of Seville," in Visigothic Spain: new approaches, ed. Edward James (Oxford: 1980), 243–50. The evidence for the earliest reception of Isidore in Ireland and its literature is now conveniently listed by Donnchadh Ó Corráin, Clavis litterarum Hibernensium: medieval Irish books and texts (c. 400–c. 1500), 3 vols (Turnhout: 2017), 237–40, 495–96.

[33] In the following section, the most recent edition of book 5 of the Etymologiae is used: Valeriano Yarza Urquiola and Francisca Javier Andrés Santos, eds., Isidoro de Sevilla, Etimologías, Libro V: De legibus—De temporibus (Paris: 2013).

More comprehensive and more focussed on calendrical science is a collection of Isidorian excerpts in the 10th-century codex Paris BnF Lat. 5239. It consists of Isidore's sections De temporibus (Etym. 5.28–39, i.e. including the chronicle), De astronomia (Etym. 3.23–70), and on cosmology (Etym. 13), in this order.[38] This collection of Isidorian excerpts also sheds more light on the curious fact that in the Berlin codex the table of contents of De temporibus is directly followed by the text of De astronomia.[39] Evidently, the copyist omitted, for whatever reason, the entire text of De temporibus of his source. Therefore, both manuscripts bear witness to the construction of a textbook on the reckoning of time from Etymologiae 5.28–39, 3.23–70, and 13.[40]

[34] The chapter numbering of Gasparotto and Guillaumin, Isidore de Séville, Étymologies, Livre III, differs from Lindsay's (i.e. Etym. 3.23–70, Gasparro and Guillaumin, eds. = Etym. 3.24–71, Lindsay, ed.).

Note that De astronomia (Etym. 3.23–70) on its own can more frequently be found in 9th-century manuscripts; cf. Bern BB 207, 189r-194v (Fleury?, *c.*AD 800?; available online at: http://www.e-codices.unifr.ch/de/list/one/bbb/0207); 417, 34r-44v (Fleury?, AD 826?).

[39] See n. 37 above.

[40] Note that in some manuscripts of the Etymologiae, De astronomia (Etym. 3.21–70) is followed by Isidore's De natura rerum and De temporibus (Etym. 5.28–39). For this so-called 9th-century "Zopfingen metamorphosis," see Kendall and Wallis, Isidore of Seville, On the

Curiously, however, the core of any computistical work, a discussion of the calculation of Easter, is missing. The 9th-century codex Paris BnF Lat. 5543 may provide the missing link here.[41] It is closely related to the just discussed manuscript BnF Lat. 5239. Thus, one would expect both codices to transmit the same Isidorian excerpts. Compared to BnF Lat. 5239, BnF Lat. 5543 likewise produces Isidore's De temporibus (Etym. 5.28–39) and De astronomia (Etym. 3.23–70) in this order, but does not include book 13 of the Etymologiae on cosmology.[42] The reason for this is immediately apparent: the text breaks off abruptly at Etym. 3.70.20 (… Nam interdum in austrum) at the end of the page, followed by a beautifully illustrated pseudo-Bede De signis coeli.[43] Clearly, pseudo-Bede replaced the end of the Isidorian excerpts of BnF Lat. 5543's exemplar, which is more faithfully preserved in BnF Lat. 5239. On the other hand, in BnF Lat. 5543 a substantial excerpt of Etym. 6.17(.1–20) can be found, which is separated from the other parts of the Etymologiae by 9th-century verses on the Julian calendar months and the zodiac signs, plus an excerpt from the 9th-century pseudo-Bede De arithmeticis propositionibus.[44] It may well be that these verses and pseudo-Bede were introduced by the 9th-century compiler to replace what originally was Etym. 6.17.21–32. If so, Paris BnF Lat. 5543 and 5239 combined may provide evidence for an earlier composition of all excerpts of the Etymologiae relevant for time-reckoning, in this order: Etym. 6.17 (De ciclo paschali), 5.28–39 (De temporibus), 3.23–70 (De astronomia), 13 (De mundo et partibus).

Our best witness, however, is the famous Bobbio Computus (Milan BA H 150 inf.), a compilation of computistical knowledge of the 4th to the early 9th centuries, assembled in Bobbio in the AD 810s on the basis of material collected through Irish, Anglo-Saxon, Frankish, and Italian channels. Though these two excerpts are not in successive order here, they may well have been originally, with later additions separating them in this later copy. Harley 3017 also includes Isidore's Easter table updated to AD 627–721, which is closely related to Paris BnF Lat. 5543 (cf. p. 507 below).

it transmits successively Etym. 6.17 (De ciclo paschali), 5.28–38 (De temporibus, without the chronicle), and 3.23–70 (De astronomia). This compilation of excerpts from the Etymologiae focuses more strongly on computistics proper, not including book 13 on cosmology. Considering the content of the earliest Irish textbooks and Bede, this is what one would expect, as cosmology was treated by these authors as a separate discipline (though Isidore's De natura rerum is copied later in the Bobbio Computus and may have been connected to these excerpts originally).

But where was this compilation of Isidorian excerpts first produced? Both the Bobbio Computus and the two Paris manuscripts provide valuable clues. In the Bobbio Computus, the Isidorian excerpts form an integral part of a section of Sirmond material. As will be seen,[45] the Sirmond material was evidently available in Ireland from the AD 630s, and a major compilation of such texts was produced in the border region between Munster and Leinster in AD 658. In the Bobbio Computus, the Isidorian Easter table is updated to AD 798–892 (i.e. the time of compilation of this manuscript),[46] and the Victorian computistica immediately following the Isidorian excerpts include a summa annorum of AD 672 written in Burgundy.[47] This suggests that this group of texts, including the Isidorian excerpts, were first compiled in Ireland around AD 660, updated in Burgundy in AD 672, and included in this major computistical codex in Bobbio in the AD 810s.

The two Paris codices originate from mid-9th-century Fleury or the Loire Valley more generally, an area highly influenced by Irish intellectual thought at this time. More definite proof comes from a fragment of the Etymologiae in Irish script discovered by James Carley in Longleat House, Marquess of Bath, NMR 10589. Its Easter table suggests a close relationship to the Fleury excerpts.[48] The Longleat House fragment, however, covers Etym. 6.16.6–17.9, 7.1.29–38. Thus, it is not a fragment of a compilation of passages of the Etymologiae relating to time-reckoning, but rather represents a larger excerpt of the text, presumably all 20 books. The Longleat House fragment is written in Irish script and includes an Old Irish gloss, a clear indication for Irish origin of the manuscript.[49] Palaeographic analysis seems to indicate a date of composition around AD 700. The marginal notes to the Easter table reveal that the exemplar of this Irish copy was a Visigothic copy of the Etymologiae written in AD 655 or shortly thereafter. These facts point to the following scenario: a copy of Isidore's Etymologiae incorporating an updated Easter table for AD 627–721 was produced in Visigothic Spain in AD 655 or shortly thereafter. It reached Ireland a few years later, where all passages relating to time-reckoning were extracted to form an independent textbook on calendrical science. Presumably through Breton channels, like many other computistica from Ireland, these excerpts reached Fleury/Loire Valley, where they were copied in the mid-9th century.

Excerpts of Isidore's section on Easter (Etym. 6.17: De ciclo paschali) are usually transmitted independently of any other parts of the Etymologiae. Effectively, Etym. 6.17 consists of three rather independent parts: (1) Etym. 6.17.1–4 on the history of Easter "cycles"; (2) Etym. 6.17.5–9: the 95-year Easter table; and (3) Etym. 6.17.10–32 on the theory of Easter calculations. The second part, the Easter table, is discussed above; the first part will be discussed below.[50] The third part, Etym. 6.17.10–32, provided the key theory (though only from Isidore's limited perspective), and it enjoyed a separate, very early transmission. This early transmission may be the reason why it was not more commonly included in the comprehensive collection of relevant excerpts on time-reckoning, astronomy, and cosmology outlined above: this section of the Etymologies had already established itself as an independent tract. In fact, in two manuscripts of the separate line of transmission (Bern BB 610; Bobbio Computus), this tract (Etym. 6.17.10–32) is labelled Epistola Cyrilli,[51] presumably to give it more authority or because the beginning drew on pseudo-Cyrill.[52] In the third codex of this independent line of transmission, the 8th-century manuscript Paris BnF

Shorter citations from Etym. 6.17 also circulated separately widely, but an analysis of such instances certainly lies outside the scope of the present article. It may suffice here to hint at the potential of studying such smaller quotes in more detail. The manuscripts St Gall SB 225, St Gall SB 110, and Einsiedeln SB 321 (647) share a computistical text consisting of the following elements:[56]

1. Explanation of the bissextile day as the annual increment of 3 hours (the remainder of dividing the 8760 hours of a year by 7), accumulating to 12 hours in four years.

In each of the manuscripts, this computus of AD 751 is integrated in a larger computistical section; St Gall SB 225 and 110 share the same material up to pp. 131 and 524, respectively. The content of this computus of AD 751 is discussed by Kerstin Springsfeld, "Eine Beschreibung der Handschrift St. Gallen, Stiftsbibliothek, 225," in Computus and its cultural context, eds. 9. On the seasons, the second half of Isidore, De natura rerum 7.4.[57]

The item that is of interest for the present study obviously is no. 6, Etym. 6.17.21–24. This Isidorian passage appears to be forced into the older layer of AD 743, probably at the time of composition of the text in AD 751. There is no immediate logic as to why a discussion of common and embolismic lunar years was introduced at this stage, or even in this text at all, since otherwise the focus is exclusively on the solar year and linear timelines. But this excerpt shows a significant alteration of the text. Isidore states that a lunar year should be counted from luna 14 of one Easter lunation to luna 14 of the following one. Dionysius Exiguus, in his letter to Boniface and Bonus, however, had more precisely argued that the count should start at luna 15 of an Easter lunation.[58] The excerpt here corrects Isidore's text on the basis of Dionysius,[59] which demonstrates that by AD 751 computists had compared Isidore's treatmeant of Easter calculation with his sources.

No attempt to use Isidore alone for the creation of a computistical textbook could be successful. Isidore was strong on the definition of terms, but he was very weak in the explanation of calendrical technicalities. The first task in the formation of a comprehensive computistical textbook was the definition of the various units of time. This is where Isidore was most useful. The nucleus was provided by Etym. 5.29.1: Tempora autem momentis, horis, diebus, mensibus, annis, lustris, saeculis, aetatibus dividuntur. Of these, the lustrum was immediately dropped, as it constituted an antiquated concept which amounted to no more than an accumulation of five years. In other parts of his Etymologiae, Isidore mentioned additional units: the athomos in Etym. 13.2, quadrans in Etym. 16.25.17, hebdoma in Etym. 5.32, and tempus (or, in 7th-century Hiberno-Latin terminology, vicissitudo triformis) in Etym. 5.35. Additionally, for calculation purposes, two extra units were defined, the minutum and the punctum.

[59] Springsfeld, "Beschreibung," 223, n. 46. The Bobbio Computus (cf. n. 51) shares this reading.

Tellingly, their pseudo-etymologies were ascribed to Isidore.[60] Taken together, this amounted to 14 units of time, which are in ascending order, from the smallest to the largest:

> Athomos, momentum (= 16 athomoi), minutum (= 4 momenta), punctum (= 2 ½ minuta), hora (= 4 puncta), quadrans (= 6 horae), dies (= 4 quadrantes), hebdoma (= 7 dies), mensis (= 4 hebdomada), vicissitudo triformis (tempus = 3 menses), annus (= 4 vicissitudines triformis), saeculum, aetas.[61]

These 14 units of time formed the backbone of a 7th-century Irish tract De divisionibus temporum, now lost.

The problem with De divisionibus temporum, as with Isidore's calendrical information, was that it defined everything but explained nothing. In particular, the core problem, the calculation of Easter, was not solved, or even discussed. For this reason, a fifteenth unit was soon introduced after annus, the cyclus. At first, the idea was to provide a discussion of the 19-year lunar cycle. But it soon also included the 28-year solar cycle and, more prominently, the 532-year Easter cycle; also, the key technical features of these cycles, especially the bissextus and the saltus lunae, received special attention here, as did the Julian calendar with its structural elements, including Isidorian material whenever possible. All surviving copies of De divisionibus temporum are Frankish reworkings of ultimately Irish material.[62] Up to annus, they share a fundamental common stock, but from that point onwards the floodgates were opened. Still, the principle of organising a computistical textbook around the framework of the divisions of time in ascending order remained popular. Most importantly, two of the most influential compilers of computistical textbooks, Bede and Hrabanus Maurus, followed this principle and its Isidorian core.

How Bede's earliest work on the reckoning of time, De temporibus,[63] was structured is revealed by an unpublished prologue prefixed to the text proper in three manuscripts from the 9th to the 11th centuries.[64] It begins:

> D[iscipulus]: Tempora, unde dicta sunt? M[agister]: A temperamento etiam nomen acceperunt, ut Isidorus in V Ethimologiarum libro testatur, hoc modo dicens: Tempora dicta sunt a communionis temperamento, > Student: The seasons (tempora), from what are they so called? Teacher: They took their name from regulation (temperamentum), as Isidore testifies in book 5 of the Etymologiae, saying this: The seasons (tempora) are called thus from the regulation (temperamentum) of the community, as they regulate in turn moisture, dryness, warmth, cold; or because all courses of mortal life are regulated by moments, hours, days, years, millennia, and ages.

> Student: How many divisions of time exist? Teacher: 14, which are: atom, moment, minute, point, hour, quarter-day, day, week, month, season, year, age, millennium.
> Student: How do these divisions of time grow? Teacher: Thus, from atom to moment, from moment to minute, from minute to point, from point to hour, from hour to quarter-day, from quarter-day to day, from day to week, from week to month, from month to season, from season to year, from year to 28-year solar cycle, 19-year lunar cycle, 532-year luni-solar cycle, when the return (to its beginning) is complete.

Bede rejected the athomos as a unit of time, directing his scorn against Irish computists.[65] Otherwise, however, Bede's De temporibus followed the structure of ascending units of time closely: chapters 1–6 and 8–9 discuss the nine units of momentum (40 momenta = 1 hour), hour, day, night, week, month, season, year, drawing closely on Isidore; chapters 11–12 deal with the 19-year cycle; and chapters 13–15 deal with the 532-year Easter cycle—this leaves only the rather vague largest units, saeculum, aetas, and mundus, which Bede tackles more or less collectively in chapter 16, his Chronica minora.[66] The same organising principle underlies his later, more comprehensive work of AD 725, De temporum ratione, though his various excursi dilute the structure.[67]

[65] Bede, De temporum ratione 3 (Jones, Bedae opera, 183–84; cf. Jones's commentary to this chapter on pp. 331–32). A full-scale study of Bede's responses to Irish computistics remains a major desideratum; cf. Immo Warntjes, review of: Calvin B. Kendall and Faith Wallis, Bede, On the nature of things and On times in The Medieval Review (2010). The unpublished prologue to Bede's De temporibus referred to in the previous note discusses the smallest units of time up to but excluding dies; it then continues with De temporibus chapter 2, De die.

Hrabanus Maurus, in his De computo of AD 820,[68] is more explicit. Presumably in his time in the Loire Valley (notably in Tours), he must have been in contact with Irish intellectual thought. In chapter 10, he outlines 14 divisions of time, which matches the originally Irish concept in number though not in content (hebdoma and mundus are dropped, ostentum and pars are introduced). The first 12 divisions of time, from the athomos to the year, are then discussed, in all available detail, in chapters 11–35. Chapter 36 copies the 17 different categories of year of the Libellus annalis of AD 793, chapter 1.[69] This list includes the 19-year lunar, the 28-year solar, and the 532-year Easter cycle, and serves as justification for discussing these three cycles and related aspects in chapters 37–94, still effectively as part of the section on the year. The final two chapters, 95 and 96, appropriately focus on the last two units of time, saeculum and aetas.

But how much did Hrabanus Maurus draw directly on Isidore's works? The abbot of Fulda is renown for his lack of originality, basing most of his text on Bede's De temporum ratione.[70] Maria Rissel identified only four passages in which Hrabanus appears to have drawn directly on Isidore (and, in all cases, on his Etymologiae).[71] This attribution, however, is questionable. A good example is the first passage mentioned by Rissel. She believes that Hrabanus's chapter [70] Hrabanus Maurus's De computo is even less original than is generally believed, since the standard edition by Stevens failed to identify Hrabanus's Frankish sources, like Lib. ann. 1 for chapter 37 (cf. note 91) and the unfinished Computus of AD 789. [71] Maria Rissel, Rezeption antiker und patristischer Wissenschaft bei Hrabanus Maurus: Studien zur karolingischen Geistesgeschichte (Frankfurt: 1976), 30–40. Wesley Stevens, CCCM 44, 177–82, follows Rissel in arguing that Hrabanus worked directly from Isidore.

24 De hebdomada is based directly on Etym. 5.32 (and the editor, Wesley Stevens, agrees), while it is evident that Hrabanus rather quoted from the Irish De divisionibus temporum.

> Hrabanus Maurus, De computo 24: De ebdomada: D. Ebdomada, quid est? D. Septem dierum cursus. D. Vnde dicitur ebdomada? M. A septenario utique numero ebdomada nomen accepit. Nam ebdomada Grece, septimana dicitur latine, eo quod septem manes, id est septem dies, in se complectatur.

As mentioned above, the various recensions and the textual history of De divisionibus temporum are still awaiting an authoritative full-scale study and critical edition. It is telling that of the remaining three chapters of Hrabanus's De computo identified by Rissel as evidencing considerable Isidorian influence, two (95: De saeculis and 96: De aetatibus) are integral parts of De divisionibus temporum. The third chapter (37: De planetis and origine nominum earum) is probably closer to Carolingian computistical material than Isidore's Etymologiae. It therefore seems most likely that Hrabanus, in his computistical textbook, cited Isidore only second-hand. By the time of Helperic's Liber de computo, the most influential computistical textbook of the 10th and 11th centuries, the Isidorian element was all but gone, both in terms of structure and content.[73]

[73] Helperic, De computo: Bernhard Pez, ed. (or rather transcribed from a late manuscript) in 1721, and reprinted by Migne in PL 137: 17–48. A modern critical edition of this fundamental text is a pressing desideratum. See Ludwig Traube, "Computus Helperici," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 18 (1893), 73–105; Patrick McGurk, "Computus Helperici: its transmission in England in the eleventh and twelfth century," Medium Aevum 43 (1974), 1–5; Max Manitius, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 1: Von Justinian bis zur Mitte des zehnten Jahrhunderts (Munich: 1911), 446–49;

This is the history of the computistical textbooks which evolved from Isidore's list of the units of time in Etym. 5.29.1. The earliest known specimen of this literary genre, however, took a slightly different route. Between *c.*AD 700 and 727, three major computistical textbooks were produced in Ireland, labelled in modern scholarship Computus Einsidlensis, Munich Computus, and De ratione conputandi. Their principal structure was threefold: (1) solar theory; (2) lunar theory; and (3) Easter calculation, as the combination of the first two. The first part was based on the divisions of time and was heavily indebted to Isidore. In fact, much of this first part reads like an assembly of excerpts under various headings, with Isidore providing the first entries and thus the backbone of this section as a whole. As mentioned earlier, however, for lunar theory and Easter calculation (often considered together as the second half of these texts by Irish computists), the Etymologiae were more or less worthless. To be sure, when definitions were needed and the respective term or concept could be found in the Etymologiae, Isidore was immediately cited. But Isidore neither explained nor understood calendrical science.[74] It was very fortunate, therefore, that key texts on the calculation of Easter arrived in Ireland slightly earlier than Isidore's Etymologiae. Whether these texts arrived as a defined corpus or individually remains a matter of contention.[75] Quite plausibly, however, they arrived through the same channels as Isidore's works, on a direct route from the Iberian Peninsula. The texts in question, now known as the Sirmond corpus, include at their core: the so-called Acta synodi Caesarea; Epistola Pascasini; Epistola Proterii; Epistola Cyrilli; Prologus Cyrilli; Prologus Theophili; Disputatio Morini; Disputatio Chori et Praetextati; Anatolius Latinus' De ratione paschali; Hilarus's Epistola ad Victorium; Victorius's Epistola ad Hilarium; Dionysius Exiguus's Epistola ad Petronium; Dionysius's Epistola ad Bonifatium et Bonum; and pseudo-Jerome's De sollemnitatibus.[76] Of these, Isidore himself had used some, like the letters of Hilarus, Victorius, Dionysius, Pascasinus, pseudo-Cyrill, and the Cyrillian Prologue. Still, this corpus provided Irish computists only with the bare bones of what was to flourish into a vibrant scientific subject in the second half of the 7th century. It was in the second half of their textbooks, comprising lunar theory and Easter calculation, that Irish computists had to reconstruct meticulously the calendrical systems that underlay the various tables with which they were confronted. Isidore thus seems to have provided the foundation of early medieval calendrical science, but not its technical content.

[75] Braulio's Epistola ad Eutropium of AD 640 (Riesco Terrero, Epistolario, 114) provides a list of texts which may indicate that these were readily available in one compendium in the Iberian Peninsula by this time. However, Cummian discussed a similar list a decade earlier, Maura Walsh and Dáibhí Ó Cróinín, Cummian's letter De controversia paschali, together with a related Irish computistical tract, De ratione conputandi (Toronto: 1988), 84–87. The Sirmond manuscript contains a dating clause for AD 658 which places this collection in southern Ireland; cf. Dáibhí Ó Cróinín, "The Irish provenance of Bede's computus," Peritia 2 (1983), 229–47.

Irish texts and computistical thought hit the continent almost immediately after they were produced, no doubt owing to established pilgrim routes and monastic networks.[77] From southern Ireland the principal route of transmission appears to have been through Brittany and the Loire Valley towards south-eastern Germany, Switzerland, and northern Italy.[78] By the mid-9th century, the monasteries in the Loire Valley (especially Fleury) were the leading centres of learning in the crumbling Carolingian Empire. They owed their exalted position to, among other factors, a constant influx of Irish thought and intellectuals.[79] One of the most remarkable productions of this mid-9th-century milieu is a massive scientific compendium, preserved in Vatican BAV Reg. lat. 123, to which Jacopo Bisagni has recently drawn the attention it deserves.[80] This encyclopaedia is divided into four books, about the sun, the moon, cosmology, and astronomy. The first two books are directly influenced by the Irish computistical textbook tradition, which is best illustrated by a comparison of the explicit and incipit of books 1 and 2, respectively, of this encyclopaedia with the division into two halves of the Irish textbook De ratione conputandi.

Following Irish tradition, this encyclopaedia draws heavily on Isidore. In fact, in the first two books the authorities cited are principally Isidore, Bede, and an anonymous Irish computistical textbook similar to De ratione conputandi. Isidore is not cited second-hand here, but as a major authority directly from his own works. One heading in book 1, chapter 31, stands out in this respect: Item Isidori in libro V Ethimologiarum capitula III. The Etymologiae survive in various recensions. If the book and chapter number can be trusted here, the author of this encyclopaedia cites an unusual recension. In the 20-book recension commonly ascribed to Braulio of Zaragoza, book 5 is constituted of two parts, De legibus and De temporibus. De temporibus consists of chapters 28–39, of which the chapter in question here, De diebus, is chapter 30. In the Spanish recension represented by Madrid BN Vitr. 14, 3 (Toletanus 15, 8), the two parts of book 5 are treated as separate books: De legibus is book 5, De temporibus constitutes book 6, with the chapter in question here being chapter 3 of that book. In the Italian recension, as represented by Wolfenbüttel HAB Cod. Guelf. 64 Weiss. and Cava AB 2, De legibus and De temporum are also separate books, but De medicina is placed between the two, so that the order there is: book 5—De legibus; book 6—De medicina; book 7—De temporibus (with De diebus as chapter 3).[83] None of these book and chapter divisions accord with the one mentioned in the computistical encyclopaedia in Reg. lat. 123. Apparently, the author here cites from a recension of the Etymologiae in which book 4 (De medicina) is placed later in the text, and De legibus and De temporibus are separated into books 4 and 5, respectively.

Besides the heading, another interesting aspect of this chapter is the fact that it faithfully reproduces the original chapter of the Etymologiae but with an insertion added, without explicit indication, between Etym. 5.30.8 and 9. The insertion reads:

[81] I owe the reconstruction of this passage to Jacopo Bisagni.

This poem can be found (in a more complete recension) in numerous computistical manuscripts from the early 9th century onwards.[84] It may have been part of the author's recension of the Etymologiae, but this can only be confirmed by a thorough analysis of all 9th-century manuscripts of this text.[85] More likely, the mid-9th-century author of this computistical encyclopaedia is responsible for this addition. This reworking of Isidore's original, then, provides a good insight into how some late Carolingian computists used Isidore. He was still an authority, especially in those Carolingian monasteries influenced by Irish thought, but this did not mean that his text could not, in true encyclopaedic tradition, be amended.

Finally, Vatican BAV Reg. lat. 123 helps to confirm a point raised above. The passage just discussed is tellingly part of the first book, De sole, following the practice of the Irish computistical textbook tradition, which also drew heavily on Isidore in the first part on solar theory. The second part, on lunar theory (and Easter calculation), relied on other authorities, with Isidore being only sporadically consulted. The Irish textbooks do not provide tables of contents, whereas this encyclopaedia does, which presents a neat overview of the use of Isidore and its limits in this more technical section of computistics:[86]

XLVII Bede de circulo magno paschae	47. On the great cycle of Easter according to Bede
Expliciunt capitula libri secundi de luna	Here end the chapter headings of the second book, on the moon.

For the new genre of the computistical textbook that emerged in the second half of the 7th century, Isidore provided, rather indirectly, the basic framework. As was to be expected, his Etymologiae were mined for definitions of key terms. On the more technical level, Isidore's input was minimal.

4 The Height of Computus—Isidore in the Carolingian and Post-Carolingian Era (Computistical Formularies, Calendars, and Encyclopaediae)

4.1 Computistical Formularies

The reception of Isidore's calendrical ideas was directly connected to the literary genre of the computistical textbook. As outlined above, it was invented in Ireland in the second half of the 7th century under heavy Isidorian influence; it was popularised by Bede, Hrabanus Maurus, and Helperic, and more anonymous textbooks were compiled for the specific needs of particular monastic and cathedral schools or individuals. At the height of computistical studies, between the formation of the subject in the second half of the 7th century and the wide reception of late antique learning in the early to mid-9th, the computistical textbook was not necessarily the preferred means of presenting calendrical knowledge. In the Carolingian 8th century, the focus shifted to what is termed the computistical formulary.

The origin of the computistical formulary in Latin can be traced back to Dionysius Exiguus's translation of Greek material into Latin in AD 525, including nine algorithms for, principally, calculating the data of his Easter table.[87] These were known to Cassiodorus, who (or whose circle) adapted them to AD 562.[88] In AD 582?, 625/627, and 675 they were expanded considerably.[89] The last of these expansions, known as the Computus Digbeanus of AD 675, appears to have been produced by Anglo-Saxon computists, presumably in Ireland, and Willibrord introduced this literary genre to the Frankish world, where such new texts were produced in, for example, AD 757, 760, 764, 771, 775, 780, and 789.[90] In AD 793, a monumental computistical formulary in 70 chapters was compiled, now edited under the title Libellus annalis.[91] It may have been influenced by the Admonitio generalis of AD 789, which urged all clerics to master the basics of computus.[92] Whether it was commissioned by Charlemagne (or rather his educational representatives at his palace school, especially Alcuin) is impossible to prove; the earliest transmission history points to Verona.[93] The table of contents provides a good insight into what was considered fundamental computistical knowledge:[94]

Hardly any of these headings bear any resemblance to those found in either the Etymologiae or Isidore's De natura rerum. In the Libellus annalis, as in this genre of the computistical formulary more generally, there was no room for Isidore. Isidore's interest lay in defining terms etymologically, while these formularies principally provided algorithms for calendrical calculation, of which Isidore was either ignorant or disinterested. Only when definitions were needed can traces of Isidore be found. A good example is the very first chapter on various types of years.[95] In Etym. 5.36, Isidore had outlined 3 types (genera) of years, the lunar "year" of 30 days, the solstitial year of 12 months, and the great year (magnus annus) of numerous solstitial years (the undefined period it takes all planets to return to their initial position in the zodiac). Throughout his work, however, other types of years could be found: the solar year of 365 ¼ years of Etym. 5.36.1; the common and embolismic years of Etym. 6.17.21–24; the bissextile year of 366 days of Etym. 6.17.25; the iubileus annus of Etym. 5.37.3.[96] Bede, in his De temporum ratione, used much of this information, outlining four lunar (sidereal lunar month of 27 days and 6 hours, synodic lunar month of 29 days and 12 hours, and common and embolismic years of 354 and 384 days, respectively) and three solar years (sidereal solar year of 365 ¼ days, common and bissextile years of 365 and 366 days, respectively), and the annus magnus defined as the period it takes for all planets to return to their initial position in the zodiac.[97] The Libellus annalis of AD 793 expands this list of different types of years to 17, principally adding information about the planetary orbits and the iubileus annus from a different chapter of Bede's work.[98] Thus, this Carolingian text incorporates Isidorian thought through a Bedan filter. Three of the years mentioned demonstrate the textual relationship:

More generally, Bede defined most of the fundamental computistical terminology. In this, Bede (and others) drew heavily on Isidore, but the Northumbrian's explanations were more conclusive. Also, and more importantly, Bede's textbook on the reckoning of time became a more obvious and cohesive reference point than the scattered references in the Etymologiae. Only rarely were the Etymologiae still consulted directly, mainly as additional information when the strictly computistical texts were felt to be wanting. The Libellus annalis provides another excellent example in this respect: three excerpts were added from Isidore's Etymologiae, here entitled De interlunio (Etym. 3.54 [= 3.55 Lindsay]), De eclypsin solis (Etym. 3.57 [= 3.58 Lindsay]), and De eclypsin lunis (Etym. 3.58.1–2 [= 3.59 Lindsay], also including excerpts from Etym. 49.1 [= 50 Lindsay]), to chapter 69 (De cursu solis et lunae per signa), which is exclusively based on Bede. Of the 81 manuscripts which Borst lists as containing parts of the Libellus annalis, an impressive 32 codices from the 9th to the 12th century include these Isidorian excerpts (or at least some of them, and not necessarily directly connected to Lib. ann. 69). Isidore was still used in computistical formularies towards the end of the 8th century, but two trends worked strongly against him: his lack of engagement with calendrical calculations, which formed the core of computus, and the reworking of his definitions in a more lucid and more accessible way in Irish textbooks and, especially, by Bede.

4.2 Calendars

The other important early medieval literary genre introduced by Willibrord to Francia was the calendarium. The Julian calendar became authoritative in the Roman Empire in 46 BC, and it remained the standard in the successor kingdoms after the fall of the Western part of the Empire.[99] More importantly, it was embraced by Christianity, and the liturgical calendar was designed accordingly. With the Julian calendar's counter-intuitive structure of counting days backwards from fixed marker days (e.g. Ides of March = 15 March; second [day before the] Ides of March = 14 March; third [day before the] Ides of March = 13 March; etc.), some explanation was needed for students of the emerging science of computus. In Etym. 5.33, Isidore provided etymologies for all twelve Julian calendar months (January, February, March, April, May, June, July, August, September, October, November, December), and for the three marker days (Calends, Nones, Ides), but similar to his account of the Easter cycle, he did not provide practical information, not even the essential details, such as how many days the individual months have, or on which days the marker days are placed in the individual months. As with his chapter on Easter, 7th- and 8th-century computists embraced Isidore's definitions, but they used more appropriate literature for the technical details. For calendrical theory, relief came through excerpts from Macrobius's Saturnalia, which circulated under the title Disputatio Chori et Praetextati.[100]

Unlike his treatment of Easter, Isidore did not provide a table in his discussion of the Julian calendar months. This is important, because Isidore would have been a (if not the) prime witness for the transmission of the Julian calendar from Late Antiquity to the early Middle Ages. As the transmission history stands, there is a fundamental gap between the calendars of Philocalus and Polemius Silvivius of AD 354 and 448/449, respectively, and Willibrord's calendar of the late 7th century.[101] The late antique calendars were produced in a Christian milieu; the calendars themselves, however, portray no information concerning the regulation of the liturgical year. This was the key function of the calendar after it was fully absorbed into monastic intellectual culture, and Willibrord's calendar is the first of its kind to include such information: it marks the beginning of the medieval calendar tradition. Within the century after its introduction to the continent in AD 690, the calendar had received a prototypical format which dominated the early and high Middle Ages right into the 12th century. At least this is the theory of Arno Borst, who has admirably outlined this tradition in his monumental three-volume edition of the so-called Reichskalender.[102] The centrepiece of Borst's theory is the Lorsch calendar of AD 789 (preserved in Berlin SBPK Phillipps 1869).[103]

[100] An editio princeps of this fundamental text with translation and substantial commentary by Leofranc Holford-Strevens is in press.

[101] The Fasti of Philocalus and Polemius Silvius are edited in parallel in Theodor Mommsen, Corpus inscriptionum latinarum 1.1 (Berlin: 1863), 332–57; Willibrord's calendar is edited by H.A. Wilson, The Calendar of St. Willibrord: A facsimile with transcription, introduction and notes (London: 1918).

A calendar principally contains twelve sections, one for each month. More often than not, each month occupies one manuscript page. The basic structure for each month is a list of all its dates. Since the calendar was appropriated to serve specific liturgical customs, saints' days were included for some dates. Also, key computistical information relating to the calculation of Easter (or not) was noted, such as the spring equinox, the beginnings of the seven embolismic months, the saltus lunae, the beginnings of the seasons, and the entry of the sun into specific zodiac signs. On the left-hand margin, alphabetic and numeric sequences allowed for the calculation of the weekday, lunar age, and place of the moon in the zodiac for any given date for any given year. Also, additional information was prefixed and attached to each month.

Tracing Isidorian influence in the calendar tradition is even more problematic than it is for the other computistical genres, simply because the transmission history is so complex. Borst has identified and classified 252 calendars dating between the 8th and the 12th centuries that fitted his definition of being ultimately descended from Charlemagne's Reichskalender.[104] To a surprising degree, his prototype calendar (the Lorsch calendar of AD 789), the basis of this tradition, shows no visible trace of Isidorian influence. Only the mention of the Dog Days (the period of visibility of the Dog Star, Sirius) may go back to Isidore. For 14 July, the Lorsch calendar notes dies caniculari. The term may have been taken from Etym. 3.70.14 (= 3.71.14 Lindsay) or De natura rerum 26.14 (both dies caniculares). The more likely scenario, however (especially since Isidore did not provide a specific date), is that this information was taken from a Roman (?) model, as it was an integral part of Polemius Silvius's calendar,[105] and maybe also of the Codex cosmographium mentioned by Bede.[106] In fact, if Borst's reconstruction of the earliest medieval calendar transmission is correct, a Roman model moved from mid-7th-century Rome to Anglo-Saxon England to Charlemagne's court in the AD 780s in a relatively unaltered form.[107] Thus, the pre–mid-7th-century Roman origin of this archetype of the medieval calendar would place it outside of Isidorian influence.

[105] The dies canicularis is noted by Polemius Silvius for 27 July (p. 347). In the earliest medieval calendar tradition, between Willibrord (*c.*AD 690) and the Reichskalender (AD 789), the dies caniculares can be found for 14 July in Trento MP 1590, 211v (northern Italy, *c.*AD

On the other hand, the relatively late date of origin of the defining prototype exposed it to Bedan influence. In fact, Paul Meyvaert has argued that Borst's Reichskalender represents, in effect, the lost calendar originally attached to Bede's De temporum ratione.[108] Certainly by AD 789, originally Isidorian information would now be cited through a Bedan filter, as discussed above. A good example here are the beginnings of the Egyptian months. Isidore (DNR 4.7) had outlined the Julian calendar date on which each of the Egyptian months commenced. About their names, however, he remained silent. Bede, on the other hand, provided both in De temporum ratione, taking the dates from Isidore, and the names from Polemius Silvius or a comparable Roman calendar.[109] Since the names of the Egyptian months are explicitly mentioned in the Reichskalender at the date of their commencements, this information comes directly from Bede, not Isidore.

A more fruitful approach for tracing Isidorian influence in the early medieval calendar tradition may be to focus on its earliest, pre-Reichskalender specimen.[110] The computistical information in these is very limited; there is a strong focus on martyrological (and some historical) entries. This may hint at a development of the early medieval calendar tradition independent of Roman exemplars, straight out of brevaries (short martyrologies) by computistically trained monks. Certainly, there is no trace of Polemius Silvius in Willibrord's calendar. An interesting case in point is Willibrord's references to the beginning of the seasons. Polemius Silvius had noted these at the equinoxes and solstices. Willibrord, on the other hand, followed Isidore (DNR 7.5) by setting the beginning of the seasons exactly 30 days before the equinoxes and solstices. Isidore's influence is further revealed by Willibrord's mention of the length of each season. Interestingly, however, while Willibrord's calendar reproduces the exact same date for the beginnings of the seasons as Isidore (VIII Kal. Mar. = 22 February—spring; VIIII Kal. Jun. = 24 May—summer; X Kal. Sept. = 23 August—autumn; VII Kal. Dec. = 25 November—winter), the number of days attributed to each season is different (spring: Isidore 91, Willibrord 91; summer: Isidore 91, Willibrord 91; autumn: Isidore 93, Willibrord –; winter: Isidore 90, Willibrord 91). In terms of the number of days Willibrord is closer to a passage in the Bobbio Computus, and it may well be that Willibrord here worked from such an (Irish?) reworking of Isidore rather than directly from the bishop of Seville's writings.[111] Later practice, in the Reichskalender and subsequently, of noting both Isidore's and Bede's beginnings of the seasons (Bede's falls two weeks earlier than Isidore's) is heralded by the famous Ilmmuenster fragment in Anglo-Saxon script of the second quarter of the 8th century.[112]

Likewise, the Anglo-Saxon Walderdorffer fragment of the mid- to late 8th century noted the traditional Roman solstices and equinoxes, which may well have been taken from Isidore DNR 8.1 or Etym. 5.34.2–3.[113] The Irish-Merovingian Nivelles calendar of the first half of the 8th century also noted the old Roman winter solstice on 25 December but otherwise preferred the Greek date, four days earlier.[114] Irish computistical texts of the early 8th century had recorded both traditions, and it therefore is not surprising to find them both in an Irish-influenced calendar of a few decades later. Both traditions remained popular in later centuries.

Isidore also has his place in the post-Reichskalender tradition. Quite expectedly, Isidore's etymologies of the names of the months (DNR 4.3–4; Etym. 5.33.3–11) feature in some calendars as a prelude or, more often, appendix to each month. Some quotations are direct, others through a version of the Irish De divisionibus temporum (which included citations from Macrobius's Saturnalia, or rather the tract Disputatio Chori et Praetextati = Sat. 1.12.2–15.20, which enjoyed a separate transmission). Two lines of transmission can be traced for these etymologies in the early medieval calendar tradition, one branching out from late 9th-century St Gall to south-east Germany (especially Borst's calendars F 4, 6, f 2, 3), the other from the Loire Valley of the late 10th century to southern France (represented by G 1 and 2). It is noteworthy that these Isidorian additions were made in areas traditionally influenced by Irish thought.

More isolated examples of Isidorian influence on the calendar tradition also point to centres with Irish connections. For example, Isidore's list of concordances of the length of daylight in each month (DNR 5.1: January = December, February = November, etc.) appears as an addition to the calendar proper in a 9th-century Reichenau codex (and also in a late-9th century manuscript from Echternach).[115] More interestingly, Isidore's curious reference to IV Nonas Martii (2 March) in connection with the bissextile day (Etym. 6.17.27) can be found, explicitly mentioning Isidore by name, in the mid-9th century Loire Valley–northern French codices Karlsruhe BLB Aug. 167 (F 2) and St Gall SB 248 (F 3). These calendars were heavily influenced by Irish thought, as this reference to the bissextile day on 2 March reveals as much as the Irish saints mentioned therein.[116] From northern France–Loire Valley this Isidorian concept may have found its way back to Spain, if the calendars in El Escorial RB d.I.2 (Albelda, AD 974–76) and Silos AM 4 (Albelda, AD 1052) (c 19, 20 in Borst) were not fed by more native traditions.

On the whole, however, Isidorian influence in the calendar tradition is extremely minimal. Whether Bede or Charlemagne revolutionised this genre in the 8th century is likely to remain a matter of dispute. Certainly, Bedan (and Plinian) thought almost completely dominated the computistical and astronomical references provided in this genre. The limited space which the calendar structure provided certainly did not leave much room for discussion of alternative views. If genuinely Isidorian quotes can be traced in early medieval calendars, they relate to a pre-Bedan or pre-Bedan influence stratum (with Bede's computistica not receving a major reception before the AD 780s), or to local, often Irish-influenced preferences.

4.3 Computistical Encyclopaediae

If Isidore is least represented in the calendar tradition, he is best attested in the third genre of computistical texts to be discussed for the Caroligian period, and the only one that originated in the Carolingian Empire. The Annalis libellus of AD 793, though still a computistical formulary, had reached a considerable size. It appears that shortly after this date a central decision was taken for the production of comprehensive computistical encyclopaediae. The two key codices of the Carolingian era, produced shortly after AD 800 in Cologne and Verona (Cologne DB 83-II; Berlin SBPK Phillipps 1831), are the earliest attestations of a substantial collection of diverse material. In AD 809, the year of the famous Council of Aachen, this material was excerpted and rearranged, eventually pressed into a more cohesive structure in seven books, dealing with (1) the liturgical calendar and chronology, (2) basic calendrical formulae, (3) the Julian calendar year (solar calculations), (4) lunar calculations, (5) astronomy, (6) measurement, and (7) cosmology.[117] This was followed in AD 818 by an even more substantial work, which is commonly attributed to the bishopric of Salzburg.[118] It was arranged in 115 chapters, not in books, and therefore lacks the clear structure of the earlier work of AD 809. Here, the organising principle was literary genres rather than subjects. The first part (c. 1–12), on chronology and the liturgical calendar, deals with tables; the second (c. 13–63) is modelled on the computistical formulary; the third (c. 64–99) is an abridged version of Bede's computistical textbook, De temporum ratione; the fourth (c. 100–08), fifth (c. 109–11), and sixth (c. 112) are modelled on the encyclopaedia of AD 809, outlining astronomy, measurement, and cosmology; and c. 113–15 are simply addenda.

In these two encyclopaediae, the section on cosmology would have been the most natural place to incorporate Isidorian thought. However, Isidore's De natura rerum was superseded by Bede's work of the same name, which was included in full in both. Bede had outshone his predecessors and teachers, whose voices could only be heard through his filter, not only in computistics, but also in cosmology.

[117] The encyclopaedia of AD 809 is ed. under the abbreviated title of Lib. comp. by Borst, Schriften, 1054–1334.

[118] The encyclopaedia of AD 818 is ed. under the abbreviated title of Lib. calc. by Borst, Schriften, 1367–1451.

But the Carolingian intellectual centre, the Aachen palace school (or any other intellectual circle), did not dominate or control scientific thought in the long run (presumably not even in the short run).[119] The disintegration of the Carolingian Empire from the AD 830s onwards led to the establishment of new intellectual powerhouses, and the periphery overtook the former centre, employing its own approaches to learning, its own preferences in essential readings. Good examples are Fleury and St Gall, whose influence is visible because of an excellent transmission history of its libraries.[120] Both monasteries benefitted from Irish intellectual thought, which the Carolingian centre around the Aachen palace school had tried to sideline in favour of Bede as the authoritative author. Since Irish tradition was strongly based on Isidore, the master received recognition when his students were consulted.

An excellent example of an Irish-influenced encyclopaedia is transmitted in Vatican BAV Reg. Lat. 123, written at Ripoll in AD 1056.[121] But except for a brief section inserted at this time and place,[122] the content reveals an origin in the mid-9th century Loire Valley (probably Fleury).[123] Compared to the two encyclopaediae of AD 809 and 818, this one has a more structured approach, classifying scientific thought in four categories/books: (1) solar theory; (2) lunar theory; (3) cosmology; and (4) astronomy. The first two books have been discussed above, and they show as strong an Isidorian influence as appropriate for the subject matters. The third and fourth books are best suited for comparison with the earlier encyclopaediae. While the texts of AD 809 and 818 simply reproduce Bede's De natura rerum for cosmology, the Vatican encyclopaedia assembles knowledge directly from various sources, principally Bede, Pliny, and Isidore.[124] For astronomy, the two earlier encyclopaediae principally relied on Pliny. The Vatican encyclopaedia again presents a much broader approach, as the table of contents of book 4 illustrates:[125]

The Vatican encyclopaedia demonstrates at least two crucial aspects. First, the Carolingian centre around the Aachen palace school of the early decades of the 9th century did not dominate the scientific thought of later decades. The centre's preference for Bede was not necessarily met by the developing intellectual hubs in other regions of the disintegrating empire, like Fleury and St Gall. In these monasteries, the Isidorian voice was stronger. Second, though Bede remained Isidore's (and the Irish's) main rival for what at this stage may be classified as traditional computistical thought, in the newly emerging discipline of astronomy a more serious challenge was posed by the revival of Isidore's predecessors, the late antique authors Pliny, Hyginus, Calcidius, Macrobius, Aratus (and Martianus Capella).

Post-Carolingian computus (and thus Isidorian influence) is difficult to assess because of the sheer wealth of unclassified material: hundreds if not thousands of computistical manuscripts of the 9th to the 11th centuries have survived that await systematic analysis. From what is known at present, Isidore's Easter table received some sort of a revival between the mid-10th and the mid-12th centuries, in two phases.

The first phase, connected to the famous Abbo of Fleury, certainly is the more curious of the two. Towards the end of the 10th century, Abbo kicked off a trend of recalculating the incarnation era. Eight such attempts produced between the late 11th and the mid-12th centuries are well known to modern scholarship; a ninth awaits a thorough study.[126] The authors of these recalculations are classified as the "critical computists" in recent historiography.[127] Since the introduction of the Alexandrian Easter reckoning in the Latin West through Dionysius Exiguus's table, the incarnation era introduced (or copied) by Dionysius puzzled computists. In the 7th century, adherents of the Victorian reckoning confronted followers of Dionysius with the fact that for any potential year of Christ's resurrection, AD 31 or 34 (depending on the Gospel tradition followed), the Dionysiac reckoning produced data contrary to the Gospels (which indicated crucifixion on luna 14 or 15, resurrection on luna 16 or 17). Bede tried to browse over this problem with sarcasm and reference to authority.[128] Abbo then accused Bede of scholarly misconduct or tired- and laziness, as he had identified the problem but had not even tried to find a solution.[129] Abbo's thoughts on this question developed in two stages.[130] The first may be described as a chronographical solution: When inspecting Eusebius's chronicle (in Jerome's translation), Abbo realised that three years are missing in Dionysius's count of the period from Christ's birth to the accession of Diocletian; he therefore added three years to Dionysius's AD count and then constructed a new Easter table (for which see below) that produced resurrection data in accordance with the Gospels and Patristic tradition for the year 34 in his new count. Abbo's second attempt was chronological, based on the cyclical characteristics of the 532-year Easter cycle: The combined evidence of the Gospels and Latin Patristic tradition indicated that the resurrection had taken place on Sunday, 27 March, luna 17. In the 532-year Easter cycle, only the 13th year displayed these required data for Easter Sunday, which was equivalent to AD 12 according to Dionysius. Abbo took this as the 33rd year of his new count, adding 21 years to Dionysius.

In both recalibrations of the incarnation era (and especially in the first), Abbo made use of a Cyclus Sancti Cyrilli Alexandrini, a 95-year Easter table of which the first and the last 19 years are reproduced beside Abbo's newly constructed Easter table of his first attempt (Dionysius's AD + 3).[131] The format alone suggests that Abbo's exemplar was an Isidorian Easter table (with concurrents added). In fact, what Abbo had in front of him was Isidore's Easter table updated to AD 627–721.[132]

In the separate transmission of only Isidore's Easter table, the ascription to Cyril rather than Isidore himself certainly was not uncommon (as will be seen below), and it is worth recalling that Etym. 6.17.10–32 is transmitted as a letter of Cyril in the Bobbio Computus.[133] The 9th-century Fleury codex London BL Harley 3017 transmits Isidore's Easter table updated to AD 627–721, though the table is not there ascribed to Cyril.[134] The same table was also copied in another 9th-century Fleury manuscript, Paris BnF Lat. 5543, as part of a longer excerpt of Etym. 6.17 not identified as Isidore's composition.[135] The first page of the table (145r) contains at the bottom a continuation from the previous page of the passage that precedes the table in Etym. 6.17. This continuation, right underneath the table, begins beatissimus Cyrillus Alexandrinae urbis episcopus, which could have led to an identification of the table as a work of Cyril. Abbo worked from this table, either from these two surviving Fleury copies, or from a now lost version with a more direct attribution to Cyril.

If, therefore, Abbo is direct proof of interest in and application of Isidore's Easter table around the year AD 1000, he also hampered the reception of Isidore's computistical definitions and explanations. Under Abbo, computus became more schematised. All basic information was now pressed into a tabular format or was otherwise visually displayed. This shift from text to table certainly worked against Isidore. On the other hand, the 11th century was destined for a revival of interest in at least Isidore's Easter table, in a second, post-Abbonian phase. In the second half of the 11th century, the limits of traditional computistics became apparent, especially through the works of Hermann of [132] Verbist, Duelling, 47, mistakenly believes that Isidore's original table covered AD 627–721, a claim that goes back to van der Hagen, Observationes, 241, and was popularised by Ludwig Ideler, Handbuch der mathematischen und technischen Chronologie, 2 vols (Berlin: 1825–26), 2: 290. It also found its way into the most recent Italian and English translations: Angelo Valastro Canale, Isidoro di Siviglia, Etimologie o Origini, 2 vols (Turin: 2006), 501, n. 60; and Priscilla Throop, Isidore of Seville's Etymologies, 2 vols (Charlotte: 2005), no pagination: "judging by the dates given for Easter, Isidore uses the tables for the years 627–721"; Stephen A. Barney, W.J. Lewis, J.A. Beach, and Oliver Berghof, The Etymologies of Isidore of Seville (Cambridge: 2006), 143–44.

Reichenau and the Lotharingian Gerland.[136] The 19-year lunar cycle, the basis of early-medieval Easter calculations and the unshakable centre of Abbo's chronological thought-world, was seriously called into question. The awareness of its limitations led to an intensive search for alternatives. Eventually, this paved the way for the adoption of new, Arabic science in the Latin West. More specifically, from the first half of the 12th century, the Muslim and the Jewish 30-year lunar calendars were compared with the traditional system, particularly in southern Germany.[137] Before this new science became available, alternatives were sought in the past rather than in other cultures.

This may be one explanation for the increasing antiquarianism in the 11th century. A good example for the engagement with late antique calendrical models is the (unpublished) 11th-century gloss to chapter 11 of Bede's De temporum ratione from Tegernsee (Munich BSB Clm 18156, 16v), in which the author compared the Easter reckonings of Dionysius Exiguus, Victorius of Aquitaine, and Anatolius Latinus. In this environment, a revival of interest in Isidore's Easter table appears like a natural reflex, especially when it was transmitted outside of its immediate Isidorian context. In that case, it appeared like an archaic 95-year Easter cycle, potentially the one famously attributed to Cyril of Alexandria. Certainly, because of the lack of AD dates, it was not immediately apparent that this table refers to the same reckoning as the standard Dionysiac one. But Isidore's table also appealed to those who knew better. As established above, Isidore's original table covered the years AD 532–626. The Easter cycle represented by this 95-year Easter table was of 532 years. Therefore, the Isidorian table was outdated after AD 626 but regained currency in AD 1064, when it could be applied again for the subsequent 95 years.

That this theory is not mere speculation is demonstrated by the codex Zürich ZB Rh. 83, 14r-17v.[138] It was originally composed in the monastery of Kempten (an offshoot of St Gall) around AD 1000. In the first quarter of the 11th century, the codex was transferred to Rheinau. The section in question here, 14r-17v, constitutes a separate quaternion and was added later. The table was introduced by the words:

> Cyclum hunc quinquies per decemnovenalem ductum beatus Cyrillus Alexandrinę urbis episcopus adinvenit. In quo per XCV annos diem sancti paschę cum luna ipsius absque dubio invenies.

There are annal entries for the years equivalent to AD 1117, 1128, 1141, 1145, and 1148. Thus, in southern Germany in the second half of the 11th century, where the basis of Christian time-reckoning was called into question, the Isidorian Easter table received some attention because of its ascription to a late antique authority (Cyril of Alexandria) and its alleged 95-year cyclic period. When it was recognised as a representative of the Alexandrian-Dionysiac reckoning, which was the undisputed standard throughout Christendom, it was used for recording relevant events. Only a systematic study of 11th-century computistical manuscripts will reveal whether this 11th-century Isidorian Easter table is an isolated example or represents a broader trend.

6 Epilogue: Isidore in the Computistical Tradition of the Iberian Peninsula

The diligent reader will have realised that the forgoing study has principally outlined Isidorian influence on early medieval computistical literature outside of Isidore's native Spain (or rather the Iberian Peninsula). The evidence for the Iberian Peninsula is relatively sparse. It appears that Pope Vigilius's letter to Bishop Profoturus of Braga of AD 538 initiated a century-long Easter controversy which centred on the question of whether Victorius or Dionysius provided the more appropriate system for the calculation of Easter, as witnessed by the paschal letters of the monk Leo and Braulio of Zaragoza.[139] By AD 650, not accidentally coinciding with contemporary developments in Rome, the debate was settled in favour of Dionysius. After this time, the evidence becomes even sparser.

Two documents stand out and deserve closer examination. The first is a layer dateable to AD 663 in Paris BnF Lat. 609, a 9th-century codex written in a Visigothic hand.[140] The dating clause seems to apply to the entire section of folios 71r-88v. This Computus of AD 663 is the first major surviving computistical text produced on the Iberian Peninsula,[141] and therefore is our prime witness for 7th-century Iberian computistical thought. This highly original work draws mainly on Dionysius's computistical writings, but also on Isidore's definitions: for example, Isidore's etymology for epacts (Etym. 6.17.29) is cited on fol. 78v; his etymology of intercalares (Etym. 6.17.28) on fols 79v-80r; the placement of the epact on 22 March (Etym. 6.17.31) on fol. 80r; his definition of bissextus (Etym. 6.17.26 and 27) on fol. 86r-v; his definition of ciclum (Etym 6.17.3–4) on fols 86v-87r; and his discussion of the pasch (Etym. 6.17.11–12) on fol. 87r-v. In general, however, most of the text is of a technical nature and contains numerous calendrical algorithms, and therefore draws rather strongly on Dionysius. For the present study, this text is of considerable importance for three main reasons: (1) it proves that Isidore is cited in computistical literature as early as AD 663; (2) it shows that Etym. 6.17 (De ciclo paschali) received an almost immediate reception in his native Iberia; and (3) it suggests that Isidore's impact on 7th-century Iberian computistical thought was extremely limited, not comparable to his defining role in the insular world.

Handschriften (Zürich: 1932), 196–97; Jacob Werner, "Die ältesten Hymnensammlungen von Rheinau," Mitteilungen der antiquarischen Gesellschaft 23 (1891), 81–84.

[139] Cf. n. 17.

The second document of major importance for early medieval Iberian computistics is the tract termed Prologus Aquitanus (Prol. Aquit.) by its most recent editor, Arno Borst.[142] The title is misleading, as the text is better placed in the Iberian Peninsula proper rather than in Aquitaine.[143] It survives in only one manuscript, the 11th-century Ripoll MS (Vatican BAV Lat. 123) that preserves the 9th-century computistical encyclopaedia from the Loire Valley (probably Fleury) discussed above. In this encyclopaedia, the tract constitutes book 2 chapter 45. It is dated to AD 721, which by itself is a very suggestive date: In this year, the 95-year Easter table of AD 626–721 expired, which made recalculation for the subsequent 95-year period (or longer) necessary. In fact, the tract is quite specific about its purpose, serving as a prologue to a Dionysiac Easter table covering the years AD 722–919 (the end date was determined by the next occurrence of Easter Sunday on its latest possible date, 25 April). Isidorian influence is very difficult to identify. The mention of 22 March as the placement of the epacts in chapter 3D may hint at Isidore, as he was the first author to specify this date, at least judging from the surviving evidence. But then the wording does not show direct dependence, and in the AD 720s this information certainly was common knowledge. More interesting is the second part of this text, if Borst's edition is followed. Borst considers chapters 45 and 46 of book 2 of the mid-9th-century encyclopaedia in Vatican Reg. lat. 123 as two parts of the same text. The first editor of this tract, Charles W. Jones, however, rightly put more faith in the compiler's chapter divisions.[144] The wording is strikingly different, and whereas the tract proper, chapter 45, constitutes a highly original text, the following chapter only consists of verbatim citations. The main such quotation is Etym. 6.17.1–4, Isidore's brief account on the history of Easter cycles. Interestingly, this short quotation has its own transmission history,[145] and should therefore be considered a separate tract here as well.

[141] Earlier computistical texts that have survived from Iberia include: the paschal letters mentioned in n. 17; the tract De pascha attributed to Martin of Braga is not from his pen (Pierre David, "Saint Martin de Braga est-il l'auteur d'un traité de comput pascal?," Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas y Museos 62 (1956), 685–97), whereas the treatise Quo tempore initium mundi may well be; a treatise entitled Expositio Bissexti. Critical edition of these last two texts will be published by Alden Mosshammer shortly. A monograph on early Iberian computistics by Alden Mosshammer and myself is in preparation.

[143] Warntjes, "Köln," 78–79.

These two key texts have much more to offer than providing us with an insight into the (limited) influence of Isidorian thought on Iberian computistica. These texts reveal distinctive characteristics of Iberian computistics, like Alexandrian/Dionysiac Julian calendar limits for Easter Sunday as 22 March–24 April + 25 April (i.e. 25 April being considered an exception), the placement of the epacts on 31 December, and the feria qua ducit annum (the weekday of 1 January, + 1 in bissextile years), but also the Hispanic era. None of these can be found in Isidore's treatment of the subject. Isidore can thus be safely placed outside of the discernable Visigothic computistical tradition. He had no interest in the subject, did not engage with the key issues outlined by his contemporaries, and leaves no mark on Iberian computistical thought. This is extremely apparent in later manuscripts in Visigothic script, the most famous being El Escorial RB d.I.2 and d.I.1, León AC 8, and Paris BnF nal 2169.[146] They principally preserve computistica from the early 9th to the 11th century. These are heavily influenced by Carolingian thought but also include traditional Visigothic features. Isidore, on the other hand, is tellingly absent.

7 Conclusion

Isidore's influence on the early medieval science of computus may be summarised, chronologically, as follows:

1. In book 6, chapter 17, of his Etymologiae, Isidore copied a 95-year Alexandrian Easter table from an unknown source. Isidore's treatment of this table as cyclic, even though the recorded data as basic as the 4-year bissextile cycle proved the opposite at a glance, reveal the bishop of Seville as a rather limited calendrical scientist. Isidore's table (and, no doubt, his exemplar) covered the years AD 532–626. It was divided into five sections of 19 years. The first of these was very soon adapted to AD 627–45, resulting in a hybrid table covering AD 627–45 + AD 551–626. Braulio of Zaragoza may have been involved in the process, but this needs further study. Precisely because of its non-cyclic character (pace Isidore), the table itself was frequently adapted to the present time of the copyist. Traces of such reworkings of the table can be detected for AD 632/655, 721, 779–97, 855–73. A detailed analysis of all 8th- to 10th-century copies of the Etymologiae will surely reveal many more stages of adaption, which will shed a bright and unparalleled light on the reception of the Etymologiae.
2. The Etymologiae were circulated very widely almost immediately after their production.[147] Their first use in strictly computistical literature can be dated to AD 663 in Isidore's native Iberian Peninsula. On the other hand, the earliest Visigothic computistical texts show very distinctive technical features. None of these is shared by Isidore, who can therefore safely be placed outside of the Visigothic computistical tradition.
3. In computistical terms, Isidore had the biggest impact in Ireland. Ireland can be regarded as the cradle of the medieval science of computus, and Isidore played a major role in its formation there. In the second half of the 7th century, Irish scientists invented the computistical textbook, a comprehensive guide to this new science. The textbooks were typically divided into three sections: on solar and lunar theory, and the combination of the two, Easter calculation. Isidore provided the structure and much of the content, principally definitions, for the first of these (solar theory). Authors like Bede and, later, Hrabanus Maurus followed Irish precedents in two different ways. They produced comprehensive computistical textbooks in the Irish tradition, but applied a distinctive structure, which was ultimately based on 7th-century Irish tracts discussing the various divisions of time, from the atom or moment to the world ages or the cosmos. The nucleus of this structure can be found in Isidore's writings.

4. The Carolingian period (*c.*AD 750–850) constitutes the height of the science of computus. The computistical formulary became more dominant, the calendar tradition took off as an omnipresent phenomenon, and the computistical encyclopaedia was invented. Isidorian thought played a very minor role in computistical formularies, as this genre was a century older than Isidore's writings and the bishop of Seville himself did not engage with it in any way. Likewise, the calendarium owed to pre-Isidorian Roman models and its limited blank spaces (one line per day) came to be filled with Bede and Pliny; still, Isidorian concepts can be detected in the earliest, 8th-century specimen of this genre. The encyclopaediae reveal a very notable predilection towards Bede at Charlemagne's palace school, sidelining Irish thought and its Isidorian foundation.
5. In the context of the fragmentation of the Carolingian Empire in the second half of the 9th century, the scientific centres of the former periphery developed into major intellectual hubs with their own interests and preferences. Especially regions traditionally influenced by Irish thought, like the Loire Valley and the Lake Constance area, gave Isidore more scope than the Carolingian centre had been prepared to do a few decades earlier. This period also saw the rise of new subjects. Astronomy did not remain an ancillary science to computus, but with the introduction of a number of late antique authors (Pliny, Hyginus, Macrobius, Martianus Capella) providing astronomical accounts of considerable length, it became a subject in its own right. The second half of book 3 of the Etymologiae, appropriately entitled De astronomia, was an obvious starting point. But the more material became available, the more Isidore was eclipsed, for the same reason as for computus: Isidore principally defined; he did not explain, conceptualise, or calculate.
6. The 10th century saw a notable shift in computus, from a principally text-based to a table-based science (still to be studied in detail). This left even less room for Isidorian thought.

7. Still, the late 10th and 11th centuries appear to have been more favourable to Isidore. It was realised that the traditional methods of time-reckoning did not operate with a sufficient level of precision, or ran counter to theological authority. Alternatives were sought, both in the past and in different cultures. Texts like De ratione paschali by Anatolius Latinus were studied before Arabic and Hebrew science provided serious alternatives. Isidore's Easter table, lacking a linear timeline (especially AD), thus appeared archaic. Abbo of Fleury mistook it (in an updated version of AD 627–721) for the Easter table of Cyril of Alexandria (†AD 444), and tried to use it for his recalculation of the incarnation era. Only closer inspection revealed that the underlying system was the same as that unanimously used in Western Christianity, the Alexandrian-Dionysiac system. But then, Isidore's table could be applied again for Easter calculation: The Alexandrian-Dionysiac reckoning was cyclic in 532 years; thus, Isidore's orginal table of AD 532–626 also worked for AD 1064–1158. Whether there was as much of an Isidorian revival in the 11th century, however, still needs to be investigated.[148]

CHAPTER 17

Isidore in the Carolingian and Ottonian Worlds: Encyclopaedism and Etymology, c. 800–1050

Sinéad O'Sullivan

1 Introduction

Isidore's Etymologiae, the "Grundbuch des ganzen Mittelalters,"[1] attests to the importance of the encyclopaedic and etymological traditions within medieval intellectual culture. Isidore's antiquarianism and penchant for collecting made him an authority in the medieval West and ensured his floruit in the Carolingian and Ottonian worlds. In particular, his scholarly methods, already discussed in previous chapters, were widely deployed by early medieval writers and provide insight into the intellectual context of his reception. This paper focuses on the use of Isidore by glossators and commentators from the 9th to the early 11th centuries. It highlights his significance as demonstrated by glosses on a range of heavily glossed pagan and Christian authors. Isidore was regarded as an authority and functioned as a source of information, including on Greek words. More importantly, through examination of glosses this study considers the influence of Isidore's intellectual inheritance on early medieval scholarly culture.

Whilst discussion and debate surround Isidorian studies, there is consensus about the speed of dissemination of some of his writings, his pervasive influence, and the significance of his methods.[2] Questions remain about whether or not there was direct or indirect dispatch of Isidore's works from Spain to Ireland and from Ireland to Britain,[3] and whether his knowledge of classical

[2] However, as Marina Smyth, "Isidorian texts in seventh-century Ireland," in Isidore of Seville and his Reception in the Early Middle Ages: Transmitting and Transforming Knowledge, eds. Jamie Wood and Andrew Fear (Amsterdam: 2016), 111–30 has shown, there was limited transmission of a number of Isidore's works until the eighth century.

[3] For a recent summary of the debate, including a survey of the debt of "early medieval Irish or Irish-influenced exegetical learning" to Isidore, see Claudia Di Sciacca, Finding the right words: Isidore's "Synonyma" in Anglo-Saxon England (London: 2008), 37–76. literature was first- or second-hand.[4] The evidence strongly suggests that at least some of Isidore's works were in circulation in the insular and continental worlds by the late 7th century.[5] The studies of Marina Smyth, Immo Warntjes, and Roy Flechner show familiarity with Isidore's Etymologiae and De ecclesiasticis officiis, for example, in Ireland by the end of the 7th and early 8th centuries.[6] As for the manuscript evidence, two groups of early fragments for the Etymologiae are extant in St Gallen, Stiftsbibliothek 1399 a. 1, dated to the 7th century, and in the flyleaves of Longleat House, Marquess of Bath, NMR 10589, dated to the late 7th or early 8th century.[7] Already by the 7th century Isidore Beeson, Isidor-Studien, Quellen und Untersuchungen zur lateinischen Philologie des Mittelalters 4 (Munich: 1913), 120–22.

[4] That Isidore acquired his knowledge of many of his sources at second hand has been noted by many. See, esp., Jacques Fontaine, Isidore de Seville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique (Paris: 1959), vol. 2, 742–62; Jocelyn N. Hillgarth, "The position of Isidorian studies: a critical review of the literature 1936–1975," Studi medievali, 3rd Series, 24 (1983), 845–53; Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz, "La trasmisión de los textos antiguos en la peninsula Ibérica en los siglos VII–XI," Settimane di studio del Centro italiano sull'alto medioevo 22 (1975), 138–40; Stephen A. Barney, W.J. Lewis, Jennifer A. Beach, and Oliver Berghof, The "Etymologies" of Isidore of Seville (Cambridge: 2006), 10–17. Various arguments have been developed regarding Isidore's appropriation of antique learning, ranging from a wider Christian repurposing of the classical past to the importance of the Visigothic context. See Jacques Fontaine, "Isidorus Varro Christianus," in Bivium. Homenaje a Manuel Cecilio Díaz y Díaz (Madrid: 1983), 89–106; Di Sciacca, Finding the right words, 8; Barney, et al. The Etymologies, 16; Jamie Wood, The Politics of Identity in Visigothic Spain: Religion and Power in the Histories of Isidore of Seville (Leiden: 2012), 56.

[5] See Martin Ryan's chapter in this volume for an examination of Isidore's reception in England and Ireland.

[6] Marina Smyth, "Isidorian texts in seventh-century Ireland," re-evaluates the evidence for the reception of Isidore in seventh-century Ireland and cautions against the assumption that certain works of Isidore were available by circa 650. She argues that several of Isidore's works were available by the late seventh century. See also Immo Warntjes, The Munich computus: Text and translation: Irish computistics between Isidore of Seville and the Venerable Bede and its reception in Carolingian times (Stuttgart: 2010). Roy Flechner, The Hibernensis: A study, edition, and translation, with notes (PhD dissertation, Oxford: 2011). The reference to Flechner's work on the Canones Hibernenses and the borrowings from Isidore are derived from Marina Smyth's paper mentioned above.

[7] The discovery of the St. Gall fragments was first published by Alban Dold and Johannes Duft, Die älteste irische Handschriften-Reliquie der Stiftsbibliothek St. Gallen mit Texten aus Isidors Etymologien (Beuron: 1955). Their origin has been attributed by E.A. Lowe to an Irish centre on the Continent, probably Bobbio, and by Bernhard Bischoff to Ireland. See E.A. Lowe, Codices Latini Antiquiores: A Palaeographical Guide to Latin Manuscripts Prior to the Ninth Century, vol. 7 (Oxford: 1956), no. 995; Bernhard Bischoff, "Die europäische Verbreitung der Werke Isidors von Sevilla," in Mittelalterliche Studien: Ausgewählte Aufsätze zur Schriftkunde und Literaturgeschichte, vol. 1 (Stuttgart: 1966), 180–81; Bernhard Bischoff, "Eine verschollene Einteilung der Wissenschaften," in Mittelalterliche Studien, vol. 1, 285, n. 43. The Longleat House flyleaves were analysed in James P. Carley and Ann Dooley, "An early Irish fragment of Isidore of Seville's Etymologiae," in The archaeology and history of Glastonbury abbey: Essays in honour of the ninetieth birthday of C.A. Ralegh Radford, eds. Lesley Abrams and James P. Carley (Woodbridge: 1991), 137, 144. See also Baudoin Van den Abeele, "La tradition manuscrite des Étymologies d'Isidore de Séville," Cahiers de recherches médiévales et humanistes 16 (2008), 199.

[8] For example, computistical evidence demonstrates familiarity with Isidore by the late seventh century in Ireland. Dáibhí Ó Cróinín's original assessment that Isidore may have been available by the mid seventh century is modified by the findings of Immo Warntjes who dates various Irish computistical texts to the late seventh and early eighth centuries. See Dáibhí Ó Cróinín, "A seventh-century Irish computus from the circle of Cummianus," Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy 82 C (1982), 423–24; Warntjes, The Munich computus, lx; Warntjes, "A newly discovered prologue of AD. 699 to the Easter Table of Victorius of Aquitaine in an unknown Sirmond manuscript," Peritia 21 (2010), 255–84. Seventh-century Hiberno-Latin writings display indebtedness to Isidore. And the seventh-century writer, Virgilius Maro Grammaticus, who had close connections to the Irish, appears to have drawn upon the Etymologiae. See Di Sciacca, Finding the right words, 38–39, 47. Early knowledge of Isidore in Anglo-Saxon England is furnished by the Canterbury biblical commentaries, dated to the period ca. 650–750, and by the Épinal-Erfurt glossary, dated to the last quarter of the 7th century. See Biblical commentaries from the Canterbury school of Theodore and Hadrian, ed. Bernhard Bischoff and Michael Lapidge (Cambridge: 1994), 1; Michael Lapidge, "An Isidorian epitome from Anglo-Saxon England," in Anglo-Latin literature, 600–899, ed. Michael Lapidge (London: 1996), 190–91; Di Sciacca, Finding the right words, 47; Michael W. Herren, "The transmission and reception of Graeco-Roman mythology in Anglo-Saxon England," Anglo-Saxon England 27 (1998), 90–91, 97–98; Loredana Lazzari, "Isidore's Etymologiae in Anglo-Saxon glossaries," in Foundations of learning: the transfer of encyclopaedic knowledge in the early Middle Ages, eds. Rolf H. Bremmer Jr and Kees Dekker (Paris: 2007), 63–93. For the Continent, the earliest knowledge of the Etymologiae at Corbie can be dated to the second half of the seventh century. See Bischoff, "Verbreitung," 176.

[9] For the important role of the Irish in the development of Isidorian pseudepigrapha, see Robert E. McNally, "Isidorian pseudepigrapha in the early Middle Ages," in Isidoriana: colección de estudios sobre Isidoro de Sevilla, ed. Manuel C. Díaz y Díaz (León: 1961), 305–16. There is a growing body of evidence that several Isidorian works were avidly read and used in early medieval Ireland. See, esp., Michael W. Herren, "On the earliest Irish acquaintance with Isidore," in Visigothic Spain: New approaches, ed. Edward James (Oxford: 1980), 243–50. Marina Smyth offers some qualifications, based on her analysis of cosmographical materials, however: Marina Smyth, "Isidore of Seville and early Irish cosmography," Cambridge Medieval Celtic Studies 14 (1987), 69–102 and Marina Smyth, "Isidorian texts in seventh-century Ireland."

writings appear in Irish computistical texts attesting to his reputation.[10] In addition, Irish grammatical and vernacular writings show indebtedness to the Spanish compiler; Isidore is a source for the Florilegium frisingense, a compendium of Irish exegetical material;[11] he is glossed in Old English;[12] he is used by prominent scholars, such as Bede and by Anglo-Saxon missionaries;[13] his writings appear in Frankish centres and are excerpted in florilegia;[14] and the pace of his dissemination accelerates on the Continent.[15] By the 9th and 10th centuries, Isidore is a standard author in library catalogues, booklists, and reading guides,[16] and his influence is attested by glosses, glossaries, florilegia, and encyclopaedias.[17]

[12] For Old English glosses on Isidore, we have the evidence of an Isidorian epitome, extant in a 9th-century continental manuscript, which is regarded as a copy of an insular exemplar written in the 8th century. See Lapidge, "Isidorian epitome," 183–223. For the relationship between the epitome and Anglo-Saxon glossaries, see also Lazzari, "Isidore's Etymologiae," 68. Moreover, the vernacularisation of Isidore is not confined to the Etymologiae. For instance, Claudia Di Sciacca, Finding the right words, 149 has highlighted the "uses and adaptations that were made of the Isidorian text (ie Synonyma) in Old English."

[13] Di Sciacca, Finding the right words, 47–52 and Barney et al., The Etymologies, 25. Rolf H. Bremmer Jr, "The Anglo-Saxon continental mission and the transfer of encyclopaedic knowledge," in Foundations of learning, 19–50 outlines the importance of the encyclopaedic tradition as reflected in the books of Anglo-Saxon missionaries.

[14] Some of the works of Isidore were in Frankish centres by ca. 780, Bischoff, "Verbreitung," 178. And a number of Isidorian works were used by Defensor of Ligugé writing ca. 700 in his Liber scintillarum, a biblical and Patristic florilegium, Bischoff, "Verbreitung," 177.

[16] Carolingian library catalogues show that Isidore took his place beside Patristic authorities and Bede, Bischoff, "Verbreitung," 188. Erwin Rauner, ed., "Notkers des Stammlers Notatio de illustribus uiris, Teil I: Kritische Edition," Mittellateinisches Jahrbuch 21 (1986), 34–69.

[17] For example, Isidore is an important source for the Liber glossarum and Hrabanus Maurus's encyclopaedic work, De universo. Another interesting example is provided by Melissa Markauskas, Rylands, "MS Latin 12: A Carolingian example of Isidore's reception into the Patristic canon?," in Isidore of Seville and his reception in the Early Middle Ages, 177–207 who studies the heavy use of Isidorian excerpts in a Carolingian homiliary.

2 Encyclopaedism: The Weight of Authorities

Isidore's most enduring contribution, the Etymologiae, "destined to become the work of reference for the entire Middle Ages,"[18] was often the first port of call for early medieval writers and compilers. The Etymologiae was a veritable storehouse of learning and heir to the traditions of etymologising and encyclopaedism.[19] The encyclopaedic tradition had an ancient pedigree, which, though never uniform in its particulars, transmitted an ideal of comprehensiveness.[20] However one ordered knowledge, encyclopaedic compendia posited some kind of "definitive status,"[21] as is indeed illustrated by the testimony of Isidore's contemporary editor, Braulio of Saragossa, who regarded Isidore's works as comprehensive.[22] Methodologically, encyclopaedism was founded on the antiquarian practices of organising, excerpting, collecting, summarising, synthesising, and citing the works of authorities.[23] Such activities had a venerable ancestry and found significant expression in the medieval world.[24] Their roots are attested in Graeco-Roman culture, important milestones within which were Hellenistic Alexandria and the Roman imperial period.[25] The encyclopaedic tradition continued apace into the late antique and early medieval worlds, with noteworthy examples furnished by the works of Boethius and Martianus Capella,[26] and by the intellectual culture associated with the 10th-century Macedonian Emperor Constantine VII.[27] With regards to use, we find encyclopaedic works such as the Etymologiae heavily excerpted by medieval glossators and compilers, as is illustrated by early Anglo-Saxon glossarial activity.[28] And it is clear that the transfer of encyclopaedic information was no simple matter. Some indication of the complexity of the process is demonstrated by the Scholica graecarum glossarum, a collection of glosses compiled well before the end of the 9th century, which may perhaps have originally been a collection of excerpts from the Etymologiae.[29] Patrizia Lendinara has shown that the Isidorian entries in this compilation of glosses were supplemented [20] Many different principles of organising information developed. For which, see Christel Meier, "Organisation of knowledge and encyclopaedic ordo: functions and purposes of a universal literary genre," in Pre-modern encyclopaedic texts: Proceedings of the second COMERS Congress, Groningen, 1–4 July 1996, ed. Peter Binkley (Leiden: 1997), 103–26. Scholars now generally urge caution in positing "a uniform cross-cultural notion of an encyclopaedic genre," Jason König and Greg Woolf, "Introduction," in Encyclopaedism from Antiquity to the Renaissance, eds. Jason König and Greg Woolf (Cambridge: 2013), 2.

[22] Drawing on Cicero, Braulio of Zaragoza, Isidore's correspondent, states: "Your books have brought us back, as if to our home, when we were roving and wandering in our own city like strangers, so that we might sometimes be able to understand who and where we are. You have laid open the lifetime of our country, the description of the ages, the laws of sacred matters and of priests, learning both domestic and public, the names, kinds, functions and causes of settlements, regions, places, and all matters both human and divine," Barney et al., The Etymologies, 8–9. Comprehensiveness went hand-in-hand with the idea of transmitting knowledge from a "universe of learning." For compendia of knowledge, see Bernard Ribémont, "On the definitions of an encyclopaedic genre in the Middle Ages," in Pre-modern encyclopaedic texts, 47–61, esp. 50. [28] A crucial witness to these activities is an Isidorian epitome (see above footnote 12). This epitome is linked with a number of glossaries. Two Old English glosses in the epitome, for which no source has been found, are also in the Épinal-Erfurt glossary. And one of the Old English glosses in the epitome is related to a gloss in the Werden glossary. It would seem that a glossed manuscript of Isidore was drawn upon by a variety of different compilers. See Lazzari, "Isidore's Etymologiae," 67–68. Isidore is also a source for the Leiden Glossary, Rolf H. and conflated over time with new material from many sources.[30] A similar process is witnessed by Irish computistical textbooks, which, it would seem, drew on lists of excerpts from well-known authors, such as Isidore, Augustine, and Jerome. These excerpts in turn had often been "added to, revised, and updated."[31]

3 Etymology: The Weight of Words

The study of words and their origins was the cornerstone of the Etymologiae.[32] For Isidore, words had epistemic value: Nisi enim nomen scieris, cognitio rerum perit ("Indeed, unless you know its name, the knowledge of a thing perishes").[33] According to him, investigation of the origin of words provided access to understanding: Omnis enim rei inspectio etymologia cognita planior est ("One's insight into anything is clearer when its etymology is known").[34] Etymology,

[34] Isidore, Etymologiae 1.29.2. For etymology and language as furnishing access to knowledge and the world, see Fontaine, Isidore, vol. 1, 41: "L'étymologie y est devenue la démarche essentielle de toute connaissance"; Merrills, "Isidore's Etymologies," 303 and 307, maintains that, for Isidore, "language offered a simulacrum of the world," and that Isidore saw etymology as a "strategy to uncover the deeper significance (uis) of words and hence as a means to understand better the world they represent"; Mark Amsler, Etymology and grammatical discourse in late antiquity and the early Middle Ages (Amsterdam: 1989), 12 argues that, for Isidore, "the etymologies of the names for things constitute epistemic access to the things themselves." Some qualification is furnished by Davide del Bello who takes issue with what he regards as Amsler's interpretation of language as the "all-embracing measure of reality," in which res (objects) are conflated with uoces (verbal signs). Del Bello, Forgotten paths: Etymology and the allegorical mindset (Washington, D.C.: 2007), 97–101 argues that language was "allegorical, the visible form of invisible meanings."

then, was much more than a "diachronic analysis of a lexeme" or a methodology.[35] For Isidore, it unlocked immanent meaning, the uis uerbi uel nominis ("force of a verb or a noun").[36] As he says: Nam dum videris unde ortum est nomen, citius vim eius intellegis ("For when you have seen whence a word has originated, you understand its force more quickly").[37]

Isidore's foregrounding of words and their origins, though crucial for medieval intellectual culture, was not new. Like the encyclopaedic tradition, etymology had a long lineage stretching back to antiquity.[38] It found a home in Graeco-Roman and Judaeo-Christian cultures, for instance amongst Stoic philosophers, Alexandrian grammarians, as well as Jewish and Christian exegetes.[39] Its importance has been documented by modern scholars who challenge the assumption that "etymologies of the Isidorian kind" are outdated "curious specimens" that can be dismissed on the grounds of "semantic and phonological inaccuracy."[40]

The history of etymology is linked with long-standing debates on language and its relationship to reality, debates which underpin Isidore's understanding of words. To begin with, a search for the incorporeal informs much of ancient, Patristic, and medieval language theories. Letters, words, and language itself, together with grammatical, dialectical, and etymological enquiry, were often associated with the recovery of truth and original purity. For the Stoics, language was regarded as a vehicle to "glimpse the essential nature of reality."[41] For Augustine, language, with its ambiguities and its potential to "generate multiple homonymous or polysemous meanings," was a resource for "the discovery and exploration of religious understanding."[42] More generally, the esoteric and Hermetic strains in Jewish and Christian exegesis made language a tool for mystical signification.

Isidore's epistemology forms part of an ancient and complex debate on the correspondence between words and the world which pivoted on the theories of language as natural (i.e. words represent reality) or conventional (words are based on convention).[43] For Isidore, as we have seen, words furnish access to knowledge of things. This correspondence illustrates what Jean Jolivet characterises as the "grammatical platonism" of medieval thought according to which words and things are homologous.[44] In this tradition, words and things are intertwined "by virtue of the forms that subsist in the divine mind according to which the world was created."[45] They correspond with the "reality of ideas that both lend essentiality to the identities of things and also articulate the formalities of words."[46] For Isidore, moreover, not only is there a correspondence between words and the world, but the latter is construed as an ordered universe, a divine creation. This, in turn, further underscores the significance of etymology and the focus on the literal in his Etymologiae.

For Davide del Bello, however, the full importance of etymology can only be understood when seen in relation to allegory. Both etymology and allegory were "complementary modes of thought," the former providing the foundations on which the latter was built.[47] Etymology and grammatical studies ought then to be understood as "part of a broader epistemology where the study of voces, of verbal signs, goes hand in hand with the study of res, of objects and phenomena, that are framed in language but exist beyond it."[48] In short, etymology was regarded as an epistemological practice at the heart of early medieval hermeneutics. It opened up "interpretative routes that allegory follows and ratifies at higher discursive levels."[49] This function of etymology provides insight into the wider significance of, and preoccupation with, words in the early medieval period as attested by glosses, glossaries, word lists, glossae collectae, lexicons, and the reception of writers such as Servius, whose linguistic and antiquarian focus proved invaluable to Isidore.[50]

One key aspect informing Isidore's etymological method was the notion that immanent meaning lay beneath letters and language itself, an idea at the core of sacred onomastics, mystical orthography, and biblical truth.[51] This idea is attested in Isidore's interpretation of litterae mysticae and more generally in his semiotic understanding of letters as signs communicating information and binding things in memory: "Indeed, letters are tokens of things, the signs of words, and they have so much force that the utterances of those who are absent speak to us without a voice…The use of letters was invented for the sake of remembering things, which are bound by letters lest they slip away into oblivion".[52]

A measure of the fundamental significance of letters and language becomes clear when one considers Isidore's understanding of the original language, which appears in his discussion of the sacred languages, the tres linguae sacrae, and in his exposition on the diversity of languages. For Isidore, a direct link existed between Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. In this relationship, Latin "contained within its verbal structure the spirit … of Hebrew truth" and thus provided access to the pre-Babel, original language (i.e. Hebrew) and to Edenic purity.[53] Isidore's interest in letters, words, and etymology was thus founded on the principle of Edenic harmony. As Mark Amsler argues, it was "authorized by the Incarnation of the Perfect Word, revealing in its fullness the divine truth immanent in the original Edenic language." In short, for Isidore, the deployment of etymology was motivated not by linguistic goals but by a search for essential or original meaning (see also Thomas O'Loughlin's discussion of Isidore's theology and his linking of the structures of creation and knowing elsewhere in this volume).

4 Encyclopaedism and Etymology in the Carolingian and Ottonian Worlds

Encyclopaedism and etymology, Isidore's "twin informing principles,"[54] thrived in Carolingian and Ottonian intellectual circles and help us better to appreciate the context in which the Spaniard was used between the 9th and 11th centuries. These traditions are illustrated by the evident enthusiasm for encyclopaedic texts like Martianus Capella's De nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii and Servius's commentaries on Virgil, by Hrabanus Maurus's reworking of the Etymologiae, and above all, by the reception of Isidore, who was not simply copied but excerpted, illustrated, translated, glossed, and reworked.[55] In Carolingian theological debates, the "signifying power of language" was foregrounded by the 9th-century writer Fredegisus in his interpretation of nihil as a vox significativa in his De nihilo et tenebris ("On nothing and Darkness"). For Fredegisus, words had signification, and grammar provided a means of unlocking reality.[56]

For Hrabanus Maurus's De universo, see Elizabeth Keen, "Shifting horizons: the medieval compilation of knowledge as a mirror of a changing world," in Encyclopaedism from Antiquity to the Renaissance, 277–300. In the preface to his work, Hrabanus linked the study of words and mystical signification, Amsler, Etymology, 195. An impressive example of an Isidorian manuscript is British Library, Harley MS. 2686 (9th century, western France). It contains occasional zoomorphic and foliate decoration, diagrams, and uses yellow, green, red and brown inks. Isidore is a staple of medieval library catalogues in the 9th, 10th and 11th centuries. See, for instance, the appearance of Isidore in places where Prudentius is glossed in Sinéad O'Sullivan, Early medieval glosses on Prudentius' "Psychomachia": The Weitz tradition (Leiden: 2004), 110–11. That Isidore was glossed is illustrated by the copy of the Etymologiae in a Laon manuscript (Laon, Bibliothèque municipale, MS 447) annotated by the Irish scholar Probus of Mainz and also by the appearance of Old High German glosses on De ecclesiasticis officiis found in 9th-century manuscripts. For the annotations of the Irish master, see John J. Contreni, "The Irish 'colony' at Laon during the time of John Scottus," in Jean Scot Érigène et l'histoire de la philosophie, ed. René Roques (Paris: 1977), 62. For the Old High German glosses, see Andreas Nievergelt, "Pfiff und gesang: Althochdeutsche Griffelglossen zu Isidor von Sevilla De ecclesiasticis officiis," Zeitschrift für deutsche Philologie 129 (2010), 1–48. A famous translation of Isidore's De fide catholica ex ueteri et nouo testamento contra Iudeos into Old High German, the so-called Isidor, further attests to the reception of Isidore in the 9th century. See Kurt Ostberg, The Old High German "Isidor" in its relationship to the extant manuscripts (eighth to twelfth century) of Isidorus "De fide catholica" (Stuttgart: 1979); Elke Krotz, Auf den Spuren des althochdeutschen Isidor: Studien zur Pariser Handschrift, den Monseer Fragmenten und zum Codex Junius 25. Mit einer Neuedition des Glossars Jc (Heidelberg: 1998); Jonathan West, "The language of the earliest German literature," in German literature of the early Middle Ages, ed. Brian Murdoch (Rochester: 2004), 46–47. Isidore's continuing importance is demonstrated by the eleventh-century work, the Summarium Heinrici, which draws heavily on the Etymologiae. See Hillgarth, "Position," 890.

Isidore was also a source of information on many subjects in the early medieval world, including the liberal arts.[57] Figures such as Theodulf of Orléans, Walahfrid Strabo, and Otfrid von Weissenburg were indebted to him.[58] And a wealth of Isidorian material occurs in florilegia, glossaries, and in the margins of manuscripts. One such compilation is Laon, Bibliothèque municipale, MS 468, copied in the third quarter of the 9th century, edited by Martin Hiberniensis and heavily dependent on Isidore.[59] Further examples are furnished by important medieval glossaries, such as the Scholica graecarum glossarum and Liber glossarum, both of which derive large quantities of material from Isidore.[60] Glosses too highlight the authority of the Spaniard. For example, considerable Isidorian material is present in Carolingian and Ottonian glosses. Whilst this in itself is hardly a surprise, it nevertheless provides insight into the status of [59] On fols. 5v-8v nearly half the glosses are from the Etymologiae and on fols. 9r-18v, we find many excerpts from Isidore. See John J. Contreni, Codex Laudunensis 468: A ninth-century guide to Virgil, Sedulius and the Liberal Arts (Turnhout: 1984), 17–18.

[60] We have already seen how the compilers of the Scholica graecarum glossarum drew heavily on Isidore. As for the Liber glossarum, one of the most extensive medieval glossaries, it has been described as a "patchwork of Isidore, labelled ISID; Vergil glosses, labelled VIRGL; and two other alphabetical glossaries, namely Abstrusa and Abolita." Isidore and the influence of his "twin informing principles," namely etymology and encyclopaedism.[61]

5 Glosses in the Carolingian and Ottonian Worlds

Glosses are an invaluable source of information about the enduring reputation of Isidore and the importance of his intellectual inheritance. In what follows, I shall look at annotations across a variety of different texts in order to offer comparative analysis. To this end, I shall focus on glosses circulating between the 9th and early 11th centuries in West and East Frankish centres of learning. This study selects a cross-section of works (e.g. prose and poetic, pagan and Christian), and focuses on some of the most heavily glossed authors in the early Middle Ages, namely Virgil, Martianus Capella, and Prudentius. It will demonstrate that Isidore was a much-exploited authority whose works were heavily excerpted, interwoven with other sources and added to existing commentaries. In addition, we shall see that glosses underscore the influence of Isidore's intellectual inheritance in the early medieval period.

To begin with, Isidore was clearly regarded as an authority by compilers, as is illustrated by the prefatory material, glosses, and diagrams found in glossed Virgil manuscripts. Very often his works are excerpted or echoed, and he is sometimes named as the source of information, for example in Bern, Burgerbibliothek MS 172 (saec. IX, Paris region or Fleury),[62] where his name is underlined, along with the names of Gaudentius, Gallus, and Iunilius Flagrius,[63] and in Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Reg. lat. 1669 (mid or third quarter of the 9th century, Rheims), where contemporary scribes furnish Virgil with heavy marginal and interlinear additions drawn from many sources, but especially from Servius.[64] In her detailed study of the Vatican manuscript, Silvia Ottaviano demonstrates that the prefatory material in the manuscript, very likely copied at the same time as the text, transmits astronomical extracts from Bede's De natura rerum, Macrobius's Commentarii in somnium Scipionis, and Isidore's De Differentiis as well as excerpts from the Etymologiae and Augustine's De doctrina christiana. One of the hands on fols 1r-2v and on fol. 3v also edits the commentary of Servius and furnishes supplementary additions from Augustine's De civitate Dei on fol. 16r and from the Etymologiae on fol. 20v.[65] The excerpt from the Etymologiae is from book 3.44.1–4 and describes the five zones, the quinque circuli mundi, portrayed as climatic regions of habitable and uninhabitable lands. The name of Isidore, written in rustic capitals, appears above the excerpt and glosses the line in Virgil's Georgics 1.233: quinque tenent caelum zonae. The Isidorian gloss goes hand in hand with a schematic representation of the world on fol. 21r where the zones are depicted as parallel bands within a circle. Ottaviano has discovered an identical map in another 9th-century manuscript which perhaps emanates from Saint Germain d'Auxerre: Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, lat. 7926.[66] And in yet another glossed Virgil manuscript, Montpellier, Bibliothèque interuniversitaire, Section Médecine, H 253 (saec. IX $^2/_3$, Northeast France?), there is on fol. 21r a representation of the zones as arcs accompanied by an excerpt from Etymologiae 3.44.2–4.[67]

[63] For example, we find the names of Gaudentius and Iunilius in a gloss on Hibleis on fol. 5r on Virgil's Eclogue 1.54. For the gloss on Hibleis, see Hermann Hagen, ed., Scholia Bernensia ad Vergili Bucolica atque Georgica (Leipzig: 1867; repr. Hildesheim: 1967), 753. We find the name of Isidore in a gloss on cantantes cycni on fol. 20r on Virgil's Eclogue 9.29. For the gloss on cantantes cycni, see Hagen, Scholia Bernensia, 829. The glosses on the Eclogues in Bern 172 are from the so-called Bern scholia. Many of the glosses in the Bern scholia are often attributed to Iunilius, Gaudentius and Gallus. The name Iunilius Flagrius is commonly seen as identical to Iunius Filargirius (i.e. Philargyrius). See David Daintree, "Virgil and Virgil scholia in early medieval Ireland," Romanobarbarica 16 (1999), 351–52.

Cumulatively, these findings accord with what is known about the use of Isidore in the context of early medieval commentary on the five zones. Loredana Teresi, in her examination of the spatial depictions of the world, has noted that different visual diagrams of the zones existed and that the concept of the five zones was popularised in the Middle Ages through the writings of Macrobius, Isidore, and Bede.[68] More generally, the Isidorian excerpts and the diagrams in the glossed Virgil manuscripts listed above attest to the authority of Isidore. Further confirmation is furnished by other glossed manuscripts in which Isidore is cited, as in Valenciennes, Bibliothèque municipale, MS lat. 407 (saec. IX^2, Northeast France). In the Valenciennes manuscript Isidore, along with Nonius, Solinus, Virgil, and Servius, is mentioned by name, as in the following gloss on Aeneid 7.637.[69] The gloss is intertextual. It contains an excerpt from the Etymologiae which leads the reader from the Virgilian text to Isidore. By means of the annotation, the reader, in turn, is referred back to the passage in Virgil that is being glossed:

Furnishing the name of Isidore in an annotation was not uncommon. It is evident in many of the notes in the so-called Bern scholia, a collection of glosses on the Eclogues and Georgics which derives its name from a number of manuscripts now housed in Bern.[70] The annotation below illustrates this. It appears in a Virgil manuscript transmitting Bern scholia on the Eclogues and Georgics and expanded Servius on the Aeneid, that is, in Bern, Burgerbibliothek, MS 167 (third quarter of the 9th century, Brittany, Fleury, or Auxerre?):[71]

Much of the above passage, which repeats verbatim Isidore's Etymologiae 12.1.14, occurs in another Virgilian commentary closely related to the Bern scholia, namely in the Explanatio in Bucolica Vergilii ascribed to Iunius Philargyrius.[73] Isidore is also cited by name in other 9th-century glosses, for instance in glosses on Martianus Capella. In the heavily glossed Martianus manuscript, Leiden, Universiteitsbibliotheek, Vossianus Latinus Folio 48 (second quarter of the 9th century, Auxerre),[74] the following annotation draws on Etymologiae 13.3.1–3, and a similar arrangement of information appears in the Scholica graecarum glossarum.[75]

> Isidorus dicit, quia stochia Grece, Latine elementa, unde inuisibilia cuncta procedunt (fol. 2r).[76]

The glosses and diagrams discussed above demonstrate that Isidore was held in high regard in Frankish centres of learning. He is repeated verbatim, excerpted, and, along with other authorities, named as a source of information. Whether named or not, however, his high status is evidenced by the heavy use of the Etymologiae by Carolingian and Ottonian glossators. For instance, his reference work enriches what, according to Ottaviano, is likely to be the remnants of an ancient non-Servian Virgilian comment on the mythological Chimera now preserved in two 9th-century Virgil manuscripts.[77] In addition, we find verbal echoes and parallels with the Etymologiae in many glosses, as in the cases that follow.

The first set of glosses occurs in a 9th-century Virgil manuscript, Bern, Burgerbibliothek, MS 165 (second quarter of the 9th century, Tours).[78] Savage has shown that this manuscript is richly annotated in Carolingian minuscule by many hands drawing on a wealth of sources (e.g. Nonius, Solinus, Servius, Isidore, Festus Paulus, Philargyrius, and the Bern scholia). In the first example there are verbal echoes with the Etymologiae; in the second a considerable amount of the gloss repeats word for word a passage in Isidore:

> Eclogue 8.88

The next two annotations are from Leiden VLF 48, a richly glossed 9th-century Martianus manuscript. In the first case, we find clear verbal overlap between Isidore and the gloss; in the second, the annotator has selected portions from a considerably longer Isidorian passage:

> LINEA: Vt pictorum est futuras imagines quibusdam prius lineis adumbrare. Ita omnia in figura contingebant antiquis.[83]
> Etymologiae 19.16.2
> Vnde et nunc pictores prius umbras quasdam et lineas futurae imaginis ducent.

In all of the cases mentioned so far, glossators have either repeated Isidore verbatim or have echoed passages from the Etymologiae. Their annotations bear witness to the pervasive influence of Isidore on early medieval intellectual culture, further attested, as we shall see, by the heavy reliance of glossators on the Etymologiae for their Greek vocabulary.

6 Isidore and Greek in Carolingian and Ottonian Glosses

Carolingian and Ottonian glosses teemed with Greek and Greek-derived words (loanwords from Greek and transcriptions from Greek), as well as with Greek-Latin word pairs and etymologies. Many bilingual and Latin materials were available to supply the Greek word stock required by annotators to introduce Greek or pseudo-Greek vocabulary into their annotations, as well as to explain the Greek words and neologisms present in much-read texts, such as Martianus Capella's De nuptiis. By the 9th century, bilingual resources, such as Greek-Latin and Latin-Greek dictionaries, word lists, glossaries, hermeneumata (late antique schoolbooks), and idiomata, were in circulation.[84] Greek was also found in Graeca collecta (collections of Greek words quarried from the writings of Latin authors), lexicons, grammatical books, late Latin and early medieval writings, and especially in Patristic works.[85] While the Etymologiae was clearly not the only source of Greek, it was an important one because of its rapid dissemination and use in major bilingual manuals. For example, Lendinara has demonstrated that a significantly large portion of the entries in the Scholica graecarum glossarum, a collection of Latin definitions of Greek words that circulated in England and the continent, was excerpted from Isidore and that many of the nonce words, primarily transcriptions from Greek, are also attested in some form in Isidore.[86] Often lemmata and interpretamenta in the Scholica simply repeat Isidore verbatim, follow him very closely,[87] or are heavily indebted to him.[88]

The influence of Isidore is further evidenced by other bilingual glossaries, such as the small glossary or collection of notes known under the title Grammaticae artis nomina graece et latine notata.[89] This glossary is attested in a number of manuscripts, the oldest of which date back to the 8th century.[90] Helmut Gneuss suggests that the glossary very likely originated in France in either the second half of the 7th or the first half of the 8th century, from whence it travelled to England and also to Italy relatively early.[91] The lemmata in the glossary comprise Greek or Greek-derived words which are accompanied by Latin glosses. A large number of the lemmata and glosses are drawn from the Etymologiae, a fact of which early readers would have been aware, as is demonstrated by the rubric to the glossary in the oldest surviving manuscript dating to the middle of the 8th century now at Wolfenbüttel which includes a reference to Isidore.[92] Moreover, the glossary was not an isolated phenomenon, since many of its entries are found in other sources, for instance in the glossaries Liber glossarum, Abstrusa, Abolita, the First Corpus Glossary, the Scholica graecarum glossarum, and Interpretatio nominum ebraicorum et grecorum.[93] To illustrate Isidore's influence, I select a passage from one of the 8th-century manuscripts transmitting the Grammaticae artis nomina graece et latine notata, namely Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, lat. 7530 (third quarter of the 8th century, Monte Cassino).[94] The following entries at the very start of the glossary are derived from the Etymologiae:

> POEMA: unius libri opus
> POESIS: opus multorum librorum
> EDILYON: paucorum uersorum
> MONOSTICHON: unus uersus
> DISTICHON: duorum uersorum
> EPHODON: clausula in poemate
> EPIGRAMMA: titulus (fol. 145r22–28)
> Etymologiae 1.39.21–23
> Poesis dicitur Graeco nomine opus multorum librorum, poema unius, idyllion paucorum versuum, distichon duorum, monostichon unius. Epigramma est titulus, quod in Latinum superscriptio interpretatur; EPI enim super, GRAMMA littera vel scriptio dicitur. Epodon in poemate clausula brevis est. Dictum autem epodon, quod adcinatur ad speciem elegiaci, ubi praemisso uno longiore, alter brevior conponitur, atque in singulis quibusque maioribus sequentes minores quasi clausulae recinunt

What the Grammaticae artis nomina graece et latine notata and Scholica graecarum glossarum illustrate is that Isidore was used as a source of Greek words in bilingual manuals in the early medieval world. That Isidore was culled for Graeca is evidenced by Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, lat. 3088 (saec. IX, Rheims), which on fols 116r-121v transmits batches of glosses on mostly

Greek terms drawn from the Hieronymian correspondence with explanations primarily derived from the Etymologiae.[95]

However, Isidore was not only used as a source of Greek information, but the appearance of Greek in the Etymologiae must surely have added value to the work. After all, we know that Greek enjoyed a high status in medieval Latin culture, as confirmed, for instance, by the Hellenism of figures like John Scottus Eriugena, Sedulius Scottus, and Heiric of Auxerre, the production of enormous Greek-Latin glossaries, such as Laon, Bibliothèque municipale, MS 444, and the high profile of Greek in the Latin liturgy.[96]

Such, therefore, was the context in which Isidore functioned as a source of Greek in the early Middle Ages. Isidore's Greek was used by compilers of all kinds, including glossators. In what follows, I shall look at the Greek or Greek-derived words in early medieval glosses demonstrating Isidorian influence, whether direct or indirect. It should be remembered, however, that a very different perspective on all things Greek was also prevalent in the 9th century, as illustrated by the Opus Caroli. Interestingly, Laura Carlson has demonstrated that Isidore, whose work is rooted in the importance of words and language, functioned as a vital source for Theodulf's attack on the Greeks.[97]

7 The Use of Isidore for Greek Information

With regards to the Greek words found in early medieval glosses, it is often the case that Isidore was either the source, that there are close parallels with the Etymologiae, or that analogues appear in Isidore and other works. Glossators looked to Isidore for Greek etymologies, Greek-Latin word pairs, and Latin etymologies of Greek or Greek-derived words, and to introduce Greek into their annotations. In the following example, the word palla (a woman's outer garment) is glossed with a Greek etymology and Latin explanation derived from Isidore. The gloss occurs in a fragmentary manuscript dated to the second third of the 9th century and originating in St Emmeram in Regensburg. The fragments of the manuscript, now dispersed, transmit the Aeneid accompanied by glosses.[98] Silvia Ottaviano examined these fragments and discovered a close parallel between its glosses and those in another 9th-century codex, Montpellier MS 253.[99] Her critical edition of the gloss given below displays the influence of Isidore:

The same Isidorian passage is echoed in another 9th-century glossed Virgil manuscript, Valenciennes, Bibliothèque municipale, MS lat. 407. It occurs in a gloss on Pallas and combines two Isidorian passages, namely Etymologiae 19.25.2 and 8.11.75, the second of which is found in Servius's commentary on the Aeneid.[101] Interestingly, both Isidorian passages occur in the Liber glossarum in the entries for palla and Pallas.[102]

I am grateful to Franck Cinato for sending me a provisional version of a new edition of the Liber glossarum, which I have used in conjunction with Lindsay's edition.

Etymologiae 8.11.75 is also very likely the source of a gloss present in a miscellany transmitting a 9th-century copy of De nuptiis, namely Trier, Bibliothek des Priesterseminars, MS 100:

> De nuptiis I.40
> PALLAS Pallas Minerua dicta est, quod Pallantem gigantem interfecerit uel quod sicut putabant in Pallante palude nata est.[103]

Isidore, then, was a popular source for annotations on palla and Pallas, as is illustrated by the cases above, which derive their Latin explanations and Greek etymologies from his work. Overlap with glossaries such as the Liber glossarum may indicate that glossators excerpted Isidorian information second-hand.

In general, Isidore is often the source of Greek etymologies in glosses, as in glosses on adamantinus (incorruptible), explained in a number of 9th-century Martianus manuscripts as adamans (ἀδάμας "unconquerable") and indomitus (untamed), a pairing present in Isidore. In addition to the Greek-Latin word pair, there are verbal echoes of the Etymologiae:

> De nuptiis I.7
> ADAMANTINIS Adamans Grece, Latine dicitur indomitus, quia non potest domari nisi hyrcino sanguine[104]
> ADAMANTINIS Adamans lapis est indomabilis, qui nisi sanguine hyrcino temperatus in sua permanet duritia[105]

> Etymologiae 16.13.2
> Adamans Indicus lapis parvus et indecorus, ferrugineum habens colorem et splendorem crystalli, numquam autem ultra magnitudinem nuclei Avellani repertus. A further example of a Greek-Latin word pair derived from Isidore occurs in annotations on hyalinus (of crystal/of glass) from ὑάλινος (of glass), which occur in 9th- and 10th-century Martianus manuscripts. The loanword is annotated with the Greek word yalen (ὕαλος "glass") and its Latin counterpart vitrum (glass). Though parallel explanations appear in both Isidore and the Scholica graecarum glossarum, the pairing is ultimately Isidorian:

> De nuptiis I.66
> HYALINOS Yalen enim uitrum est Grece[106]
> Etymologiae 20.5.1
> DE VASIS POTATORIIS … Phialae dictae quod ex vitro fiant; vitrum enim Graece VALOS dicitur
> Scholica graecarum glossarum
> H 6 HIALIN vitrum; P 5 Phiala eo quod fiat ex hialin, hoc est vitro. Hialin enim dicunt Graeci vitrum; Ox 236 Fiala ex Greco venit, vitrum enim graece hialin; dicuntur fialae eo quod fiat ex hialin id est ex vitro[107]

Isidore's usefulness, however, was not limited to Greek-Latin word pairs or Greek etymologies. Early medieval glossators also turned to him for Latin etymologies of Greek or Greek-derived words, as in the case of Phosphorus (Φωσφόρος), glossed as lucem ferens (bearing light) in 9th- and 10th-century Martianus manuscripts, an interpretation very likely drawn from Isidore:

> De nuptiis II.113
> PHOSPHORI Dicitur Venus Phosphorus, i. lucem ferens, unde et Lucifer et dicitur sonipedem habere, quia umbras prae ceteris facit stellis[108]
> Etymologiae 3.71.18
> Lucifer dictus eo quod inter omnia sidera plus lucem ferat

Moreover, Isidore was culled for Greek words incorporated by glossators into their annotations, as in glosses on elementa (elements) in 9th-century Martianus manuscripts. Here the glossators introduce the words ilen (ὕλη "matter") and stochia (στοιχεῖα “elements”) into their glosses, words which also had some circulation in medieval glossaries:[109]

> ELEMENTA … Ilen Grece dicitur materies sicut Isidorus dicit, quia stochia Grece, Latine elementa[110]
> Etymologiae 13.3.1–2
> DE ELEMENTIS …. Hanc ULEN Latini materiam appellaverunt, ideo quia omne informe, unde aliquid faciendum est, semper materia nuncupatur. Proinde et eam poetae silvam nominaverunt, nec incongrue, quia materiae silvarum sunt. Graeci autem elementa STOICHEIA nuncupant, eo quod sibi societatis concordia et communione quadam conveniant

In many cases, the Greek introduced by glossators into their annotations was widely known. For instance, standard Greek word-stock occurs in early medieval glosses, as in glosses on Galaxia, Galumnate, and Galatea, which draw on the same Greek etymology, namely γάλα “milk.”[111] This underscores an important point. Many of the Greek or Greek-derived words present in early medieval glosses were commonplace, and analogues appear not only in Isidore but also in other sources. When glossing hydraula (ὕδραυλις or ὕδραυλος “a water organ”), for instance, glossators made explicit the Greek etymology of the word, itself a derivate of ὕδωρ (water). They offered the pairing ὕδωρ and aqua, which was well known.[112] Similarly, many of the Greek loanwords and their Latin counterparts in glosses were commonplace, for example, cristallus

For the loanword Galaxia, see Weise, Die griechischen Wörter im Latein, 55. The gloss on Galatea is found as follows in the ninth-century glossed Virgil manuscript, Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, lat. 7926, fol. 2v: AMARYLLIS HABET GALATEA RELIQVIT Amaryllis et Galatea sicut iam diximus duae concubinae fuerunt Virgilii. (κρύσταλλος) glacies (ice).[113] So, too, were glosses on the loanword palaestra (παλαίστρα "a wrestling school"), often annotated with the Greek word πάλη (wrestling) and Latin counterpart luctatio (wrestling).[114] Glossators also drew on well-known associations, as in annotations on Olympus, glossed with the Greek word ololampus (ὁλολαμπής "shining all over"), analogues for which appear in Servius and Isidore.[115] And glosses discussing the significance of particular Greek letters could also have been gleaned from many sources, including Isidore. A good illustration of this is furnished by glosses on Prudentius's Psychomachia in 10th- and 11th-century manuscripts. In discussing the number three hundred in the prologue of the work, glossators linked it with the Greek letter Tau (with its numerical value of three hundred) and interpreted the Tau as an iconographic image of the cross.[116] The association was already well established in Patristic and early Christian thought and was given biblical authority through certain biblical passages, such as the story of Gideon defeating the Midianites with 300 men (Judg. 7:6–8) and that of Abraham rescuing Lot with 318 followers (Gen. 14:14).[117] Isidore, then, although an important commentator on the letter Tau, was certainly not alone.[118]

In short, Isidore was one amongst many sources which glossators could draw upon for their knowledge of Greek words and letters. And very often the information in Isidore was commonplace. This brings us to another important point. The Etymologiae was part of a broad tradition of learning that included Isidore's sources and excerptors. The result was that Isidorian material was often to be found in a variety of different places. In the remaining section of this paper, I shall explore this aspect of Isidore's work. And I shall return to Isidore's intellectual inheritance, founded on the principles of encyclopaedism and etymology, demonstrating that these principles were very much evident in Carolingian and Ottonian glosses.

8 Isidore and His Intellectual Inheritance

The influence of the Etymologiae, whether direct or indirect, on early medieval glosses furnishes insight not only into the importance of Isidore but also the impact of his scholarly methods.[119] To begin with, there can be no doubt that etymology found a home in early medieval intellectual culture. Carolingian and Ottonian glosses are filled with etymologies of all kinds, as is vividly demonstrated by the opening glosses on Prudentius's Psychomachia, where 10th- and 11th-century annotators supplied the following exposition:

> Psychomachia
> Psiche Grece, Latine anima, machia autem interpretatur pugna animae (Clm 14395, fol. 141r)[120]

The above gloss dissects and subdivides the various components of the lemma, an essentially etymological strategy, and, in this particular instance, provides a Latin equivalent and explanation of the Greek title of the work.[121] Moreover, Isidore very often took centre stage in the etymological expositions of early medieval annotators, as already witnessed by the heavy use of the Etymologiae for glosses on Greek or Greek-derived words.

With regards to the other major scholarly tradition which Isidore was indebted to, namely the encyclopaedic tradition, it was at the heart of early medieval glosses. Methodologically, the key principles underpinning encyclopaedism were very often at the core of glossing practice, that is, collecting, excerpting, and drawing on authorities. These practices will be explored further, as they provide valuable insight into how knowledge was constructed in the early Middle Ages. Above all, they underscore the centrality of a tradition of learning within which figures such as Isidore operated. And Isidore not only became part of a tradition of learning, but represented a pivotal moment within it.

Essential to many of Isidore's works were the authorities he drew upon.[122] His encyclopaedic work was not just a storehouse of information but a melting pot of sources, often gleaned through intermediaries. Isidore's use of the classical auctores must surely have resonated with the antiquarian interests of Carolingian and Ottonian scholars. Crucially, however, the Etymologiae did not simply draw upon earlier works but was itself excerpted by later writers. This means that Isidorian information is to be found in any one of a number of different sources. For example, in the following gloss either Servius, whose commentaries enjoyed a floruit in the early medieval period, or Isidore could have furnished the information. The gloss occurs in 11th-century Prudentius manuscripts emanating from East Frankish ecclesiastical centres:

> Psychomachia 47
> TELA Telum dicitur quicquid iaci potest
> Servius, Commentary on Aeneid 2.468
> Telum … quicquid longe iaci potest[123]
> Etymologiae 18.7.10
> Telum … quidquid longe iaci potest

Similarly, the gloss given below, also present in Prudentius manuscripts, could have been gleaned from Servius, Isidore, or Hrabanus Maurus:

Given the prevalence of Isidore in East Frankish ecclesiastical centres and in the early medieval West more generally it is likely that the two Prudentius glosses mentioned above were excerpted from the Spaniard. Nevertheless, other sources were possible. In addition, Isidore's sources drew on earlier works, which again multiplies the range of possible sources from which glossators could have gleaned their material, as is illustrated by glosses on the mountain Falernus in 10th- and 11th-century Prudentius manuscripts. The information on Falernus can be traced back to Solinus, whose work is used by Servius, himself well known in the early medieval world. Servius, in turn, provides Isidore with his material.[126] Similarly, for the gloss IVPPITER iuuans pater, which occurs in a 9th-century Martianus manuscript, the information goes back to Cicero and is mediated by Lactantius, Servius, and Isidore.[127] A similar situation arises for the correlation of Vesta with uiua flamma in 9th-century glossed Martianus manuscripts.[128] The explication occurs in Ovid, whose work is cited by Lactantius, Isidore, and Hrabanus.[129] Moreover, Isidore's excerptors could also have provided glossators with their material, as exemplified by the annotation on Vulcan, interpreted as volans candor in the Martianus manuscript, Leiden, Universiteitsbibliotheek, BPL 36 (end of the 9th century, Lorsch?). The explanation is attested in the Etymologiae and also in Hrabanus Maurus and Sedulius Scottus.[130] Thus, we have, in effect, chains of authorities often transmitting similar material and reinforcing one another.

To further complicate matters, Isidore very often transmitted information that was commonplace, as is illustrated by the following examples. In the first case, a grammatical term sarcasmos is glossed as hostilis inrisio in 11th-century Prudentius manuscripts. The explanation could have been derived from a number of grammatical works, including Donatus and Bede,[131] or from Servius, Cassiodorus, and Isidore.[132] In the second case, the god Mercury is annotated as medius currens in the 9th- and 10th-century Martianus manuscripts.[133] The interpretation occurs in Augustine and is repeated in Isidore, in Hrabanus Maurus, and in the Vatican Mythographers.[134] In the third case, glossators of De nuptiis annotated crepusculum as dubia lux, an explanation present in Nonius, Isidore, Bede, Hrabanus, and the Scholica graecarum glossarum.[135]

In sum, the information in Isidore was frequently not unique, and the Etymologiae itself was part of a tradition of learning which included Isidore's sources and their sources, as well as his excerptors. That Isidore was part of a tradition reinforced his authority. Moreover, the Etymologiae was not simply part of a tradition, but often at the centre of it. Some indication of its importance is illustrated by glosses on the beryl in 11th-century Prudentius manuscripts. According to the annotators, the jewel has a hexagonal shape and designates perfection.[136] The information on the beryl in a gloss excerpted from Bede can be traced back to Pliny and Solinus, who in turn provide Isidore with his material.[137] Bede, however, adds an allegorical interpretation not found in the earlier sources. And his exposition is excerpted by the 9th-century compilers Hrabanus and Smaragdus.[138] The glossators, therefore, were drawing on a tradition that stretched back to Pliny and forward to Bede and Carolingian scholars, with Isidore emerging as a vital link.

9 Compiling and Constructing Knowledge

It is clear that the Etymologiae represents an important moment in the transmission of knowledge and that Isidore's reliance on authorities reflects a practice at the heart of the encyclopaedic tradition and of glossing more generally where annotators assembled material from a variety of sources. Collecting knowledge, an essential part of the encyclopaedic inheritance, appears to have been an important function of early medieval glossing. In the final section of this paper, I shall explore further the encyclopaedic practice of compilatio in order to demonstrate how glossators were gathering information. Glossators combined material from Isidore with other sources, as well as incorporated Isidore into works.

To begin with, early medieval glossators did not simply collect, but often arranged material from different sources in various ways. For instance, they sometimes gathered citations from various works in a gloss. Such practices suggest the associative and interrelated nature of knowledge, as already illustrated by the gloss on Aeneid 7.637 that drew the reader from Virgil to Isidore and back to Virgil again. The following glosses, which display heavy Isidorian influence, underscore how knowledge was compiled. The first case demonstrates the interrelated nature of learning, as well as the importance of authorities. Found in a 9th-century Virgil manuscript, the gloss transmits material from three named sources: Isidore, Virgil, and Lucan. It also contains an intertextual reference to Virgil in the piece excerpted from Isidore and this reference, in turn, leads the reader back to the lemma:

> Eclogue 1.62
> AVT ARARIM PARTHVS BIBET AVT GERMANIA TIGRIM: … fluens. Quod dificiditatem (lege difficultatem) haberet, si Parthus bibisset fluuium Orientis Isidoro dicente: Ararim fluuius Orientis, de quo Virgilius ait "aut Ararim Parthus bibet." Tamen Lucanus dicit "Rodanum morantem praecipitauit Arar." Sed sic soluitur, quod Arar fluuius Galliae est, de quo hic Virgilius dicit, Araris autem est in Oriente, de quo non dixit (Bern, Burgerbibliothek, MS 167, fol. 7r)[139]

The second example, present in 9th-century Virgil manuscripts, comprises, as Ottaviano has shown, a patchwork of three unnamed sources: Augustine, Isidore, and Servius:[140]

> Aeneid 4, 246
> Atlas rex fuit Aethiopum uel Africae, frater Promethei, maternus auus Mercurii maioris, cuius nepos fuit Tri<s>megistus; et iste Mercurius eo > tempore quo Moyses natus est fuisse reperitur a quo Atlante astrologiae artem prius dicitur excogitatam et ideo dictus est sustinuisse caelum. Vnde occasionem fabula inuenit ut eum caelum portare confingeret, quamuis mons eius nomine nuncuparetur; ob eruditionem igitur disciplinae et scientiam caeli nomen eius in montem Africae diriuatum est qui nunc Atlas cognominatur: qui propter altitudinem suam quasi caeli machinam atque astra sustentare uidetur. Qui Atlas, cum audisset oraculo cauendum esse a Iouis filio et timore nullum susciperet, a Perseo in montem conuersus est uiso Gorgonis capite, eo quod illum noluit suscipere (Oxford, Bodleian Library, Auct. F. 2. 8, fol. 98r; Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, MS Reg. lat. 1669, fol. 85r)

The first half of the above gloss draws on Augustine and Isidore, the final section on Servius.[141] What makes the arrangement interesting is that we find the same passages from Augustine and Isidore, as Ottaviano has noted, in the Liber glossarum for the entry on Athlans.[142] Indeed, the Liber glossarum, itself excerpting from Virgil glosses, may in turn very well have been used by early medieval glossators of Virgil. In the third case, found in a 9th-century glossed Virgil manuscript, two sources, Servius and Isidore, are merged into a single annotation:

> Georgics 1.94
> RASTRIS rastri eo quod radunt terram [= Servius] siue a raritate dentium dicuntur [= Isidore] (Bern, Burgerbibliothek, MS 165, fol. 17v)[143]

In the above examples, Isidore is interwoven with and cited alongside other authorities by early medieval glossators, an indication not only of his status but also of how knowledge was being made. Glossators combined and stockpiled information from authorities. This is in line with early medieval glossing practices, which often encoded the glossed text with all kinds of references to authoritative sources. Whilst the context of such practices is difficult to ascertain, the encyclopaedic endeavour was evidently very much at the heart of them.[144]

Moreover, the practice of compiling material is also evident in how Isidore is added to other works, as is illustrated, for instance, by the Isidorian interpolations in Virgilian commentaries. Isidore not only himself drew heavily on Virgilian commentary, but over time excerpts from the Etymologiae were added to collections and anthologies of Virgil comments. For example, a passage from Isidore (Etymologiae 1.39.16) is incorporated into the prologue of the Explanatio in Bucolica Vergilii ascribed to Iunius Philargyrius.[145] The Explanatio (in two recensions) is related to the Brevis expositio on the first and part of the second book of the Georgics, and to the more substantial set of glosses on the Eclogues and Georgics known as the Bern scholia, which were in circulation by the 9th century.[146] The same Isidorian passage occurs in two other closely related manuscripts which transmit a commentary on the Eclogues: British Library, Harley MS 2782 (9th century, Northeast France) and Valenciennes, Bibliothèque municipale, MS lat. 394 (late 9th century, prov. St Amand).[147] Given the close relationship between the Explanatio in Bucolica Vergilii and the so-called Bern scholia it is no surprise that identical material is present in both.

[144] There is ongoing scholarly debate about the function of glosses, a debate which originally pivoted around the notions of classroom teaching and private reading. The locus classicus for this debate is to be found in Gernot R. Wieland, "The glossed manuscript: classbook or library book?," Anglo-Saxon England 14 (1985), 153–73 and Michael Lapidge, "The Study of Latin Texts in late Anglo-Saxon England: [1] The Evidence of Latin Glosses," in Latin and the Vernacular Languages in Early Medieval Britain, ed. Nicholas Brooks (Leicester: 1982), 99–140.

[145] Thilo and Hagen, Servii grammatici, vol. 3.2, 10, 14–26; Funaioli, Esegesi Virgiliana, 23, 119.

[146] Debate surrounds the origin of these glosses with some scholars arguing that the collection was assembled in early medieval Ireland and others that it was edited there. These two opposing viewpoints are encapsulated by Brent Miles and Michael Herren. The former argues that there is no need "to posit a separate late antique collection…distinct from the one which we know existed in Ireland and was taken to the continent, replete with Christian content and glosses in Old Irish." Miles calls the entire collection the "Irish Filargirian collection." See Brent Miles, Heroic saga and classical epic in medieval Ireland (Cambridge: 2011), 32. Herren, on the other hand, argues that the collection was edited in Ireland: Michael W. Herren, "Literary and glossarial evidence for the study of classical mythology in Ireland A.D. 600–800," in Text and Gloss: Studies in Insular learning and literature presented to Joseph Donovan Pheifer, eds. Helen Conrad-O'Briain, Anne Marie D'Arcy and John Scattergood (Dublin: 1999), 55–61, 67.

[147] For the Harley manuscript, see O'Sullivan, "Servius in the Carolingian Age." The origin of the Valenciennes manuscript is unclear but its provenance can be located in Saint Amand. See Funaioli, Esegesi, pp. 22–23, 444. Bischoff, Katalog III, Nr. 6388, 399 says it is probably last quarter of the ninth century.

Isidore, however, was not only added to the prologues of Virgilian commentaries, but Isidorian material also appears in the body of such works, for example, in the glosses attributed to Philargyrius, in the Brevis expositio, and in the Bern scholia.[148] Moreover, Isidore is often mentioned by name in the Bern scholia.[149] And Isidore occurs frequently alongside Servian material in 9th-century manuscripts, as in the following glosses in Montpellier MS 253:

> PARNASIA RVPES Parnasia rupes mons Tesaliae Apollini consecratus est (fol. 10v; see Thilo and Hagen, Servii grammatici III.1, 69, 7)

> PARNASIA RVPES Parnasus mons Tesaliae … Habet duo capita: Chirram quae Apollini, Nisam quae est consecreta Libero Patri (fol. 10v; see Etymologiae 14.4.12; 14.8.11)

The first annotation draws on Servius; the second on two Isidorian passages. More generally, the appearance of Isidore in Virgilian glosses bears testimony to the plethora of non-Servian additions in early medieval glossed Virgil manuscripts. Cumulatively, the evidence demonstrates that Isidore was both heavily used by early medieval glossators of Virgil, and incorporated into existing Virgilian commentaries.

10 Conclusion

What, then, can we conclude from the above case studies about the use of Isidore in Carolingian and Ottonian glosses? Given the wide dissemination of the Etymologiae and the well-known influence of Isidore, it is hardly a surprise that he is heavily deployed by early medieval glossators who looked to him as a source of information on all manner of subjects, including Greek or Greek-derived words. And glossators, focussed on the exposition of the lemma (usually a word or words), found a readily available resource in the Etymologiae, the cornerstone of which was words and their origins. Moreover, given the influence of Isidore's scholarly methods, namely encyclopaedism and etymology, it is not surprising that these methods are evident in the glossing practices of early medieval annotators.[150] Glosses, however, provide first-hand evidence that encyclopaedism and etymology were standard scholarly tools in early medieval centres of learning. In Carolingian and Ottonian glosses, the etymological drive is ubiquitous and underscores the importance of the word in the intellectual culture of the early Middle Ages, an importance highlighted by Isidore himself and one that is inscribed in the very practice of glossing, that is, in the interpretation of an authoritative text word by word. As for the encyclopaedic tradition, it is attested in the methods of early medieval annotators who collected and excerpted material from a "forest" of sources, demonstrating that the principle of compilatio, which infused many different kinds of writings, was also at play in their efforts.[151] Early medieval glosses thus provide first-hand evidence that the scholarly practices at the heart of the Etymologiae remained essential to early medieval scholars in their endeavour to gain access to and construct knowledge. More crucially, the twin traditions of encyclopaedism and etymology, at the core of early medieval glossing and of textual culture more generally, demonstrate how it was that scholars in the 9th, 10th, and 11th centuries elucidated texts and created storehouses of knowledge culled from the authorities of the past, amongst whom Isidore indubitably was fundamental.[152]

[148] For the commentary attributed to Philargyrius, see glosses on Eclogue 3.8, which draw on Isidore, Etymologiae 12.1.14 and on Eclogue 9.36, which draw on Isidore, Etymologiae 12.7.18 in Thilo and Hagen, Servii grammatici, vol. 3.2, 50, 18–51, 3; 172, 13–18. In the Brevis expositio and Bern scholia, the comment on Georgics 1.27 (AVCTOREM FRVGVM "Auctor" ab augendo dictus) draws on Isidore, Etymologiae 10.2.1. CHAPTER 18

Isidore of Seville in Scholastic Europe

Winston Black,
Independent Scholar

1 Introduction

In the decade between 1416 and 1426 an Italian scribe and notary named Bartolomeo Landi de Landis, a native of Prato working in Volterra, made a complete copy of Dante's Commedia.[1] The Commedia covers the majority of the manuscript, but for some eighty folios after it Landi and three other scribes copied a variety of theological and philosophical works in Italian and Latin by St Augustine, Cicero, St Thomas Aquinas, and St Bernard of Clairvaux. The primary work in this section is the Sententiae of Isidore of Seville.[2] A copy of Dante in an Italian manuscript of 1426 is hardly surprising. But what do we make of Dante being copied by the same scribe with a Visigothic-era theological treatise at that time some eight centuries old, a treatise, moreover, which another Renaissance Italian scribe saw fit to complete when Landi had stopped? Hadn't Isidore long since been relegated to the Dark Ages, surpassed by the great theologians and encyclopedists of the scholastic age? Why copy Isidore's Sententiae when Peter Lombard's own Sententiae, the most important theological textbook of the scholastic era, could be found in any school in Europe, along with countless commentaries on it, including one by Aquinas?

Dante himself can help us answer these questions, for he was among those who helped keep Isidore's spirit alive in the later Middle Ages. In the tenth canto of his Paradiso, Dante meets Aquinas in the Fourth Heaven, the Sphere of the Sun. Saint Thomas is one of the blessed souls eternally dancing in the circle of Prudence, each soul breathing flame or crowned with fire, symbolizing his or her wisdom. As Dante's guide, Thomas describes for him the identity and achievements of each flaming soul. Thomas indicates one triad of prudent men, namely Isidore, Bede, and Richard of Saint-Victor, who are praised for their powers of investigation in life, which had transcended the ability of normal men (Paradiso 10: 130–32: "Vedi oltre fiammeggiar l'ardente spiro/d'Isidoro, di Beda e di Riccardo,/che a considerare fu più che viro."). Dante, writing in the early 14th century, not only considered Isidore a distinguished father of the Church, but he also imagined that Saint Thomas (nearly Dante's contemporary) thought the same. He was correct in this estimation, for Thomas is one of many scholastic authors of the high and later Middle Ages who respected Isidore's authority and carefully used his works in their own writings.

The claim that Isidore's works continued to be read and used in the time of Aquinas or Dante is, however, more controversial than might appear at first glance. Until recently, the scholarly consensus had been that Isidore and his writings were almost wholly supplanted in the 12th and 13th centuries by the works of scholastic theologians like Abelard, Peter Lombard, and Aquinas, and that Isidore's famous Etymologiae in particular were replaced by the new encyclopedias of Alexander Neckam, Vincent of Beauvais, and Bartholomew the Englishmen.[3] According to this thesis, the cultural developments of the "Renaissance of the Twelfth Century"—the rediscovery of Aristotelian physics and Galenic medicine, the translation of Arabic and Greek works into Latin, the rise of cathedral schools and creation of the first universities, and the establishment of new social and legal structures to manage a rapidly growing population—created an intellectual climate inimical to the survival of an early medieval relic like Isidore. But this consensus is more historiographical than historical, a product of generations of scholars who have been more interested in Isidore's impact on the cultures of Anglo-Saxon England or Carolingian Francia, to the neglect of Isidore's place in later centuries.[4]

The problems ensuing from this bias toward tracing Isidore's influence only in the early Middle Ages are compounded by the editors of Isidore's works, who typically (and usually with good reason) use only the earliest manuscripts of the 7th through 9th (and, less often, 10th) centuries.[5] This is the case with both William Lindsay's edition of the Etymologiae and the multivolume Etymologiae still in preparation by the Paris Société d'Édition Les Belles Lettres (1983–2010),[6] or, for example, with María Adelaida Andrés Sanz's edition of Isidore's Liber Differentiarum [II], for which she used manuscripts only through the 10th century. While we can trust Andrés Sanz when she says the manuscripts from the 11th through 16th centuries add no significant variant readings to her edition, it is unfortunate that she does not at least list those later manuscripts.[7] However, more extensive research into manuscripts and citations of Isidore demonstrates that some of his works, particularly the Etymologiae, were copied and read throughout the scholastic period (which I define generously as *c.*1000–1500) alongside new texts, and that other Isidorian works like the Synonyma gained even greater popularity in the later Middle Ages and were read in novel ways by new ascetic and spiritual movements.[8]

[3] This thesis is associated most with Jacques Fontaine, who repeated it as recently as 2000 in his monograph Isidore de Séville. Genèse et originalité de la culture hispanique au temps des Wisigoths (Turnhout: 2000), 413–14.

[4] See, for example, B. Bischoff, "Die europäische Verbreitung der Werke Isidors von Sevilla," Isidoriana. Estudios sobre San Isidoro de Sevilla en el XIV centenario de su nascimiento, ed. Ryan, and Sinéad O'Sullivan. There are two essays specifically on the Carolingian reception of Isidore in Isidore of Seville and his Reception in the Early Middle Ages, eds. Andrew Fear and Jamie Wood (Amsterdam: 2016), namely, Melissa Markauskas, "Rylands MS Latin 12: A Carolingian Example of Isidore's Reception into the Patristic Canon," 177–207; and Laura Carlson, "Adoption, Adaptation, & Authority: The Use of Isidore in the Opus Caroli," 209–30.

Some historians, to be sure, have long recognized this lasting influence of Isidore and his writing and the monumental task involved in charting this influence. Already in 1894 Theodor Mommsen marked the length of Isidore's shadow over the later medieval period: "the complete enumeration of later medieval works based on Isidore would have neither utility nor end."[9] A century later, Jacques Verger remained nearly as despairing as die Große Mommsen of tracing the influence of Isidore after the turn of the first millennium: "le sujet est immense et demanderait des dépouillements presque infinis."[10] At long last, this historical lacuna in Isidore studies is starting to be filled, most evidently by this volume and by a collection of ten essays published in 2008 and edited by Jacques Elfassi and Bernard Ribémont on the reception of Isidore in the 12th through 15th centuries. This present chapter is indebted to the work of those scholars.[11]

[5] This does not mean, of course, that we should stop tracing Isidore's influence in the early medieval period, which is the subject of many of the chapters in Fear and Wood, Isidore of Seville and His Reception in the Early Middle Ages, as well as of several essays in a special issue of the journal Antiquité tardive 23 (2015), dedicated to "Isidore de Séville et son temps," edited by Isabel Velázquez and Gisela Ripoll.

To trace thoroughly the influence of Isidore's writings, or even of just his Etymologiae, in the second half of the Middle Ages would fill a large monograph, as Arno Borst has done in tracing the influence of Pliny's Natural History,[12] and this cannot be accomplished in a single essay. Considering the limits of space, I will examine here only Isidore's most popular works (divided below between the Etymologiae and the most important theological texts) and the modes by which those works were variously received, honored, disputed, and reshaped in the 11th through 15th centuries in Western Europe, particularly in scholastic contexts.[13] These modes include not only the direct copying of all or portions of his writings, but also the translation, versification, enlargement, or other forms of modification performed by scholastic readers upon Isidore's works, who recast his texts in new forms, and employed or confronted his ideas in scholastic disputation. In most of these cases we will find that all of the individual data in Isidore's works remained valuable to the end of the Middle Ages and beyond, but that his Augustinian, etymological mindset (in which knowing the name of a thing was equivalent to knowing the thing itself) was surpassed and subsumed by the newer Aristotelian, natural-philosophical approaches of the 13th century and beyond. That is, the Isidorian parts survived, but less often the Isidorian whole. This is demonstrated by a shift in attitude toward Isidore in the scholastic age, typified by a willingness to dispute his claims while nonetheless respecting his position as a Church Father, along with a tendency to quote from or dismantle his works, taking them out of their original contexts. To be sure, this method of reading Isidore—by adapting passages of his works in new contexts and for new audiences—was hardly novel, as Isidore himself and his contemporaries carefully edited and revised passages from their own favorite ancient authors, such as Pliny and Varro.[14]

In the sections that follow I make frequent reference to specific manuscripts and collections containing works by Isidore. I make no claims to comprehensiveness in these references, but rather use them to indicate typical patterns of the diffusion of Isidorian texts in libraries throughout western Europe.

2 Reading and Copying the Etymologiae

When we say "Isidore," we very often mean "Isidore's Etymologiae," so monumental was the influence of this work in the development both of the encyclopedia genre and of grammatical modes of thinking that persisted for the rest of the Middle Ages. Medieval scribes and authors shared this identification of Isidore with his most famous work: scholastic theologians and encyclopedists could refer to a book in Isidorus and assume their readers knew that the Etymologiae were meant. Isidore was among the primary authorities for teaching medieval scholars how to compile and summarize knowledge, along with Pliny, Boethius, Cassiodorus, and, later, Aristotle in Latin translation. Isidore's Etymologiae, as edited for publication by his assistant Braulio, offered "a long-influential model for information management"[15] by summarizing the ideas of hundreds of past, and often lost, authors in topical order, an order clearly indicated by a table of contents and running headers. Lists of headings or titles in a book were rare in the early Middle Ages and became common only by the 13th century, as seen in Vincent of Beauvais's monumental table of contents to his Speculum maius.[16] Later encyclopedists often could do little more than rephrase the Etymologiae, or copy from it wholesale, as was the case in sections of Hrabanus Maurus's De naturis rerum, Alexander Neckam's De naturis rerum libri duo, and Thomas of Cantimpré's De natura rerum. Isidore likewise was a favorite example of a compilator, who gathered together the "flowers" of numerous authorities but claimed responsibility more for the presentation than the contents. Not surprisingly, Isidore features prominently in many of the florilegia compiled by students and masters of the growing universities in the 13th century.[17]

Ownership of the Etymologiae was expected of any worthwhile library after the Carolingian period. Alongside the Etymologiae Michael Twomey places the De proprietatibus rerum of Bartholomew the Englishman, the De natura rerum of Hrabanus Maurus, and the Imago mundi of Honorius Augustodunensis as the four standard encyclopedias to be found in any well-stocked library of the later Middle Ages.[18] The surviving corpus of Etymologiae manuscripts after the 11th century quickly puts the lie to claims that Isidore was forgotten in the later Middle Ages. In 1965 José María Fernández Catón published, from the notes of the Isidorian scholar August Anspach, a checklist of over one thousand manuscripts of the Etymologiae.[19] On the basis of this checklist, Baudouin Van den Abeele made a sketch of the manuscript transmission of the Etymologiae in the later Middle Ages. He demonstrates that the Etymologiae continued to be copied in the 12th through 15th centuries at the same rate as in earlier centuries, and that the work was not eclipsed by the new encyclopedias of the 13th century, at least in terms of numbers, if not authority. He counted a total of 455 complete or significant (two or more complete books) copies of the Etymologiae, and 626 of substantial excerpts. Most of those "complete" copies (365) date from the 11th through 15th centuries, and many (355) of the extracts also date from that period (though Van den Abeele marks a dramatic peak of extracts in the 9th century, 136, suggesting a vibrant Carolingian interest in the work).[20]

Historians studying encyclopedias have necessarily focused on the overwhelming influence of Isidore, and many have gone so far as to define various medieval encyclopedias according to how "Isidorian" they are. Bernard Ribémont, one of the foremost authorities on medieval encyclopedism, systematically divides the history of encyclopedias into periods of "isidorisme" and "post-isidorisme," with Alexander Neckam's De naturis rerum riding the cusp between those two definitive eras.[21] Christel Meier has constructed a similar binary for the study of medieval encyclopedias, dividing them by mode of organization, that is, according to the ordo artium (arranged by the Roman liberal arts) or the ordo rerum (based on the hierarchy of things in the created world). The most successful encyclopedias, including the Etymologiae itself and Vincent of Beauvais's Speculum maius, share aspects of each ordo.[22]

Fernández Caton provides 967 numbered manuscripts, but some are subdivided by letters a, b, and so on, so the total is rather 1080 manuscripts, according to the count of Baudouin Van den Abeele, "La tradition manuscrite des Etymologies d'Isidore de Séville: pour une reprise en main du dossier," Cahiers de recherches médiévales et humanistes 16 (2008), 198.

[20] Van den Abeele, "La tradition manuscrite des Etymologies," 199–201.

[21] This idea appears in many of Bernard Ribémont's works, but it is at the heart of his La renaissance du XIIe siècle et l'encyclopédisme (Paris: 2002). On Alexander Neckam as a transitional figure between two intellectual eras, see Winston Black, "Neckam, Alexander," in The Encyclopedia of Medieval Literature in Britain, eds. Siân Echard and Robert Rouse (Hoboken: 2017), 1411–13.

These attempts at artificially demarcating the development of encyclopedias go too far in relegating Isidore to the early medieval past. He was not forgotten at all in the scholastic period, but was simply found wanting in certain areas that were of greater importance in the 12th and 13th centuries than in the 7th. For example, readers of the scholastic age objected to Isidore's sparing quotation of Pliny's Historia Naturalis, and all of the major scholastic encyclopedists made much fuller use of that text.[23] For example, Rome, Biblioteca Vallicelliana A 18 is a 12th-century manuscript of the Etymologiae to which the scribe or readers added over 100 scholia taken from Pliny.[24]

High medieval encyclopedias, in comparison to the Etymologiae, became (paradoxically, from the modern perspective) both more scientific and more religious. On the one hand, the combination of Isidorian etymology, Plinian natural history, and (after about 1200) Aristotelian natural philosophy became a definitive aspect of most later medieval encyclopedias. On the other hand, Isidorian etymologies were "moralized" or "clericalized" as early as the 8th century in the commentary on the Apocalypse by Beatus of Liébana and in the 9th-century De natura rerum of Hrabanus Maurus. This trend continued into the scholastic era with Alexander Neckam's De naturis rerum, in which his encyclopedic catalogue of the natures of things (ostensibly a commentary on Ecclesiastes, but really much more) is an extension of biblical exegesis, Christian morals, and ethics.[25] That is not to say that Isidore did not see God's presence everywhere,[26] but it took a scholastic mindset to see a systematic, one-for-one equivalence between every object or nature and a spiritual or biblical significance: such a reading is evident in the thousands of glosses to Bartholomew the Englishman's De proprietatibus rerum, in which a natural phenomenon (for example, the heat of blood in book 4 or the bitterness of large cucumbers in book 17) is made to signify (respectively) Christ's passion and original sin.

3 Excerpting the Etymologiae

The Etymologiae were excerpted from an early date, providing single books, or parts of books as needed in new compilations: Leiden, Bibliotheek der Rijksuniversiteit, BPL 114 (9th century), formerly of Reims Cathedral, starts with just Etymologiae book 9, 5–6;[27] and a compilation on grammar, Leiden, BPL 122 (10th century), includes numerous excerpts of Etymologiae book 1.[28] Such grammatical collections were still common in the scholastic age, as in the 13th-century textbook Leiden, BPL 120, a copy of Papias's Vocabularium abbreviatum, which is both prefaced and concluded by excerpts from the Etymologiae.[29] It seems that almost any time a blank folio was available, scribes and owners jotted down relevant notes from Etymologiae, as in the first folio of Leiden, BPL 30 (1153), before a historical compilation from Eusebius, Prosper of Aquitaine, and Sigebert of Gembloux,[30] or on the first two folios of Leiden, BPL 89 (1352), where the scribe added military vocabulary from Isidore before a copy of Justin's Epitome of Pompeius Trogus.[31]

Single etymologies had a life of their own, wandering in and out of biblical commentaries, scientific treatises, and florilegia. They are rarely cited as coming from Isidore (this may have been assumed), as is the case with Isidore's etymology of fingere (Etymologiae 20.4.2), copied on the flyleaf of a southern French or Spanish manuscript of the early 13th century (Yale University, Beinecke Library, Marston 266), along with two biblical passages;[32] or when Isidorian etymologies are a source of exempla on the virtues and vices, as in Yale University, Beinecke Library, Marston 80, a northern Italian compilation from the early 15th century;[33] or as a standard source of glosses in a Bible, like Yale University, Beinecke Library 455, an English Bible from the second quarter of the 13th century.[34]

Larger sections and individual books of the Etymologiae were easily separated and inserted with other texts, a process already begun soon after Isidore's death. This appears to have been particularly true of those fields of knowledge that were technical and cumulative in nature, as in treatises on animals, stones, or plants. Such excerpts can be seen in Oxford University, Bodleian Library, Digby 13, a 12th- and 13th-century collection of lapidaries and herbals made for Christ Church, Canterbury, which includes portions of book 16 of the Etymologiae as a separate treatise on gems,[35] and in a 12th-century German medical collection (British Library, Harley 4346), in which sections of Etymologiae book 16, on weights and measures, are made to seem exotic and new with the title De ponderibus Almansoris et Serapionis ("On Weights by Almansor and Serapion").[36] In a more dramatic case of excerpting Isidore, a 13th-century papal secretary, Aegidius Beneventanus, produced a florilegium in the second half of the 13th century (Yale University, Beinecke Library, Marston 119) that contained excerpts from numerous works on matters moral, historical, genealogical, and geographical. From Isidore come a bestiary extracted from Etymologiae book 12 and a discussion of great philosophers and poets from Etymologiae books 2 and 8.[37] This latter section demonstrates close reading on the part of the compiler, who drew passages from two separate books of Etymologiae to create a brief treatise on his topic.

The copying of single books for the Etymologiae was so common, in fact, that the designer of the latest stemma codicum for the Etymologiae, M. Reydellet, proposed that each book needs to be analysed and edited separately. This proposal has been followed by the current editors of the Etymologiae for Paris Société d'Édition Les Belles Lettres.[38] For example, book 4 of the Etymologiae, on medicine, frequently circulated on its own as a medical authority alongside later medieval translations of Galen, Aristotle, and Arabic medical scholars.[39] While the authority of Isidore's book on medicine persisted through the scholastic age, the actual contents also saw some change. Numerous manuscripts of the Etymologiae in the 11th through 14th centuries contain a series of additions to book 4, which enlarge Isidore's history of the founders of medicine and provide significantly more technical details, typical of scholastic medicine, on the four humors, four elements, four parts of the body, and the anatomy of the brain. Much of this material is attributed to a Jewish scholar known as Asaph.[40]

4 The Etymologiae and New Encyclopedias

The 12th century was a golden age for the Etymologiae, at which time it was widely copied, both in full and in excerpts. Twelfth-century manuscripts of the Etymologiae abound, often copied with Isidore's De natura rerum; they were treated as a complementary pair that offered a thorough introduction to an understanding of God, man, and nature.[41] Masters and students active in Paris, Chartres, Orléans, and elsewhere—hungry for knowledge about nature before the influx of Aristotelian translations at the end of the century—continued to turn to these Isidorian works, together with the compendia of Pliny, Macrobius, and Martianus Capella.[42]

The Etymologiae remained a favorite source of natural knowledge in the later Middle Ages, but Isidore's De natura rerum did not share such popularity. This is suggested by a survey of manuscripts of De natura rerum in the Bibliothèque nationale in Paris, where only three of the dozen manuscripts held there date from after the 12th century.[43] It was typical of 12th-century philosophers to compose new works about nature, like Adelard of Bath's Quaestiones naturales or William of Conches's Philosophia and Dragmaticon philosophiae, which by the 13th century often supplanted the De natura rerum of Isidore and Bede's work of the same name as the best introduction to cosmology and physics, while still relying heavily on their early medieval ideas.[44]

The Etymologiae taught high medieval scholars about the nature of things, but it was obviously also a book about words. To that extent, the authors of new lexicons (proto-dictionaries) necessarily built on Isidore's model and wordlists in the Etymologiae and Differentiae:[45] Papias's Elementarium Doctrinae Rudimentum (or Vocabularium, finished by 1053) is an alphabetical redaction of the Etymologiae; Osbern of Gloucester used both Isidore and Papias in his mid-12th-century Panormia, as did Huguccio of Pisa, writing his Liber Derivationum in the later 12th century.[46] Alexander Neckam (whose encyclopedia I examine below) also compiled his De nominibus utensilium from Isidore's

Etymologiae with additional information from more recent lexicons, like the Phale totum of his own master Adam de Petit-Pont and Osbern's Panormia.[47] Even well into the 13th century new dictionaries made extensive use of Isidorian etymologies, such as Guillelmus Brito's Summa (*c.*1270) and Giovanni Balbi's Catholicon (1286).[48]

Between 1090 and 1120 Lambert of St Omer composed his Liber Floridus, often considered the first of a new generation of encyclopedias in the high Middle Ages, but really more of a well-organized florilegium, as indicated by its name. Lambert drew extensively from Isidore's Etymologiae, and a scribe of a later copy of the Liber Floridus (Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, lat. 8865, *c.*1250–1270),[49] made in Cambrai and apparently a direct copy of Lambert's autograph manuscript (now University of Ghent 92), made further additions from Isidore: a lapidary extracted from Etymologiae book 16 that is paired with Marbod of Rennes's De virtutibus XII lapidum nobilium, a bestiary composed of extracts from Etymologiae book 12, and an abbreviation of Isidore's De fide catholica contra Judaeos. Honorius Augustodunensis (probably an Englishman and not from Autun, as his name suggests) was perhaps the greatest encyclopedist of the 12th century. His encyclopedia Imago mundi is most similar to Bede's De natura rerum in its organization, but it is liberally supplemented by material from Isidore's Etymologiae and Pliny's Natural History.[50] Gossuin of Metz translated and expanded this work as L'image du monde in the mid-13th century, providing a pathway for Isidore into vernacular literature. Hugh of Saint-Victor makes many references to Isidore in the Didascalicon (*c.*1125), an introduction to a Christian education, and some have argued that Isidore was the main inspiration for this popular work.[51] Hugh also used Isidore's De ecclesiasticis officiis in his own De sacramentis.

Isidore's material on animals was useful in the compilation of bestiaries, which were particularly popular in the 12th century and incorporated into the encyclopedias of the 13th. A pair of bestiaries made in England around 1200 (now New York, Pierpont Morgan Library 81, and London, British Library, Royal 12 C XIX) feature passages on animals taken from the Etymologiae, the book of Genesis, and the Imago mundi of Honorius, along with sermons and medical recipes.[52] This pairing of Isidore with a later author in the compilation of a bestiary is also seen in Tübingen, Universitätsbibliothek Mc 365, a 13th-century bestiary attributed to Hugh of Saint-Victor, but which is actually a compilation of bestiary material from Hugh of Fouilloy and Isidore's Etymologiae.[53]

Some of the most extensive research done in recent years on the influence of Isidore's Etymologiae concerns its impact on the composition of the so-called scholastic encyclopedias of the 13th and 14th centuries, produced by and for the scholars of the mendicant schools and new universities, the earliest of which studia (Bologna, Paris, and Oxford) were established by the later 12th century. The scholastic nature of the new encyclopedias is defined by the presence of Aristotelian physics and metaphysics, available in Latin translations only by the turn of the 13th century. The most important of these new encyclopedias were Alexander Neckam's De naturis rerum, Bartholomew the Englishman's De proprietiatibus rerum, Thomas of Cantimpré's De natura rerum, and Vincent of Beauvais's Speculum naturale, Speculum doctrinale, and Speculum historiale (known collectively as the Speculum maius). All of these encyclopedists designed their works in response to the academic programs of the new universities, founded on the combination of Roman liberal arts and Greco-Arabic philosophy.[54] Isidore was a key source not only for facts and etymologies for these 13th-century encyclopedists, but also for their very patterns and structures for compiling knowledge; for example, Hildegard of Bingen (already in the 12th century), Alexander Neckam, and Vincent of Beauvais followed Isidore's pattern of discussing the creatures of God according to their appearance in the Creation story of Genesis.[55]

While I wish to challenge the common belief that Isidore was abandoned in the scholastic era, there can be no denying that the encyclopedists of the 13th century broke, for the most part, with the Isidorian etymological tradition by undertaking a reorganization of knowledge according to new principles of classification learned from Aristotle, Galen, and their Arabic commentators. Bernard Ribémont, Tomás Záhora, and others have recognized especially in Neckam's De naturis rerum "two major shifts in medieval encyclopaedism: the move away from the tradition of Isidore of Seville's Etymologiae, and the acquisition of [an] Aristotelian understanding of nature."[56] This did not mean abandoning Isidore outright, and it is clear that the scholastic encyclopedists were reading both Isidore and Aristotle and exploring new ways to balance two profoundly different approaches to knowledge. For example, Vincent of Beauvais carefully distinguishes between Isidore the Church Father, who was to be followed closely in matters of faith, and Isidore the encyclopedist of the natures of things, with whom he was free to dispute. When Isidore says that snake venom is cold, and Avicenna says that it is hot, neither has greater authority and we are encouraged to judge for ourselves.[57] Despite this caveat Vincent, in his Speculum naturale and Speculum doctrinale, quotes from every one of the Etymologiae's twenty books but one (the dictionary of book 10), and in ten cases Vincent used at least half of each book.[58]

Among the later and lesser-known encyclopedists can also be observed extremes in their use of Isidore, from strictly adhering to the Etymologiae to almost completely ignoring the work. In the first case, Engelbert, abbot of Admont (*c.*1250–1331), wrote his Tractatus de naturis animalium based closely on book 12 of the Etymologiae, with little recourse to the numerous encyclopedias of the 13th century. He is rare in his devotion to Isidore, which is all the more curious given that Engelbert is known for being a student of Aristotelian philosophy in Padua and is credited with introducing Aristotle's works to the Austrian region of the Holy Roman Empire.[59] At the other extreme, Arnaldus Saxo, in his mid-13th-century encyclopedia Liber de floribus rerum naturalium, does not cite Isidore a single time, and Albertus Magnus uses Isidore in his De mineralibus only in the rare cases when there is no other authority, more ancient or more recent, available.[60] While we should acknowledge these extremes, most encyclopedists of the 13th, and even 14th, centuries were still obliged to use (or pay lip service to) the traditional encyclopedic authors like Isidore and Pliny.[61] For example, Henry of Herford, the 14th-century compiler of the encyclopedic Catena aurea entium followed primarily Albertus Magnus for the structure and composition of his questions about nature, but he used a variety of ancient and more recent texts (Pliny, Isidore, the Pseudo-Aristotelian Problemata, and Thomas of Cantimpré) for detailed examples in his answers.[62]

5 Bartholomew the Englishman and Isidore of Seville

After the Etymologiae, perhaps the most popular encyclopedia of the entire Middle Ages was the De proprietatibus rerum of Bartholomew the Englishman, which I will use as a single, focused example of how a scholastic encyclopedist read and used Isidore.[63] Surviving in over two hundred manuscripts, De proprietatibus rerum was written to educate Franciscan friars and prepare them for a career in preaching, but it found use and popularity in libraries of all sorts across Europe. Bartholomew compiled his text from a wide variety of sources, encyclopedic and more strictly philosophical. Among his favorite ancient sources were Pliny and Isidore, whom he tended to use as sources of data for illustrating the philosophical arguments found in more recent texts of Greek and Arabic extraction. Much of the material in De proprietatibus rerum can be divided by an Isidorian-Aristotelian binary, as R. James Long observed in his study of Bartholomew's books 3 and 4: "this division [between etymologies and natural properties] reflects the author's conviction that we experience the world not only in itself but also by means of the words we employ to describe it."[64] In this respect, Bartholomew is still greatly indebted to Isidore, while nonetheless informed by Greek medicine and physics as learned through Constantine the African's Pantegni and Latin translations of Aristotle's De anima, De generatione animalium, and De partibus animalium.

[64] R. James Long, "Introduction" to book 3, in Bartholomaeus Anglicus, De proprietatibus rerum, vol. 1 (eds Van den Abeele et al.), 137.

Bartholomew's first book presents a brief discussion of the nature of God, restating in orthodox fashion much of the opening doctrinal statement of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, before drawing on a wide range of theologians, from ancients like Augustine and Johannes Damascenus to recent authorities like Praepositinus of Cremona Peter Lombard, and Alexander of Hales. But whenever names are concerned, Bartholomew almost invariably turns to Isidore: the meaning of Trinitas (DPR I, xiv, 16–22), the Hebrew names for God (DPR 1, 19, 3–33), and the various descriptors for Christ (DPR 1, 21, 7–35), such as digitus, columba, nubes (DPR 1, 21, 60–69).[65] In each of these cases Isidore is introduced by name, with the specific book and sometimes the title of the Etymologiae: e.g. ut dicit Isidorus libro VI Etymologiarum, or sicut patet in Isidoro libro VII. This pattern is repeated by Jean Corbechon in his 1372 French translation of Bartholomew's encyclopaedia, Livre des proprietez de choses: "sicomme dit Ysidoire … sicomme dit Ysidoire au .xvii^{e}. livre."[66]

Just as Bartholomew deftly wove quotes from Isidore together with more recent theological and canonical documents in his book 1, so also in his book 17, on plants and herbs, did he combine Isidorian etymologies with Aristotelian and Salernitan scientific and medical texts. Iolanda Ventura observes that Bartholomew employed books 3, 17, 19, and 20 of the Etymologiae in the composition of this book.[67] A typical pattern for Bartholomew in book 17, as can be seen in his passages on balm and cinnamon, is to use Isidore for the technical core of his passage, Pseudo-Aristotle's De vegetabilibus to help "modernize" that material, and Pliny for fabulous tales about the plants in question.[68] In two of his chapters on trees, Bartholomew paraphrased or quoted from the Pseudo-Aristotelian De vegetabilibus and from several glosses to the De vegetabilibus (all recent texts in the Latin schools). Though this paraphrase of "Aristotle" continues for nearly thirty pages in the modern edition, Bartholomew still gave pride of place to Isidore, whose etymology of arbor (Etym. 17.6.1–2) opens the entire section.[69] The same pattern is followed with most plants and herbs in the book: an opening statement on its name and basic identity taken from Isidore, followed by a much lengthier section on its medicinal attributes drawn from the medical and botanical texts current in the high medieval curriculum, usually Pseudo-Aristotelian works; herbals such as Circa instans, De viribus herbarum of Macer Floridus, Dioscorides alphabeticus; and medical works of Constantinus Africanus and Isaac Israeli. Isidore was not forgotten, but he was hardly sufficient in the age of scholastic medicine, informed by Aristotelian philosophy, new pharmaceuticals imported from Asia, and new translations from Greek and Arabic medical works. Isidorian etymologies served for Bartholomew not so much as the encyclopedic material that his readers were seeking, but as an extended part of the title to each chapter. That is, etymology is no longer the explanation of a thing, but an introduction to the thing.

Despite all of these claims that Bartholomew "uses" Isidore's Etymologiae, he usually does not quote the work verbatim. It is worth looking at one example of Bartholomew's incorporation of Isidore to track the ways in which Isidore was adapted for a scholastic and mendicant audience: the first chapter of book 2 of De proprietiatbus rerum, on angels, was taken entirely from the Etymologiae. I provide below on the left Bartholomew's introductory passage on angels, with his Isidorian source on the right.

De proprietatibus rerum 2.1.1–12. De interpretatione angeli (ed. Roling, 2007, 105)	Etymologiae 7.5.1–13. De angelis (ed. Lindsay, 1911)
Angelus itaque grece, hebraice malach, latine vero nuntius interpretatur, eo quod per angelorum ministerium divina voluntas populo nuntietur. Unde angelus nomen est officii, non nature. Spiritus autem semper est angelus, sed quando a Deo mittitur, tunc primo proprie angelus nuncupatur. Cui scilicet angelo licentia pictorum alas tribuit, in quarum subito motu celerem angelorum operationem figurative predicta pictoralis licentia simplicibus preostendit, sicut et poetas[70] ventis alas ascribere antiquitas non prohibuit, sicut dicit Isidorus libro VII, capitulo VII.	Angeli Grace vocantur, Hebraice malachoth, Latine vero nuntii interpretantur, ab eo quod Domini voluntatem populis nuntiant. Angelorum autem vocabulum officii nomen est, non naturae. Semper enim spiritus sunt, sed cum mittuntur, vocantur angeli. Quibus ideo pictorum licentia pinnas faciant, ut celerem eorum in cuncta discursum significent, sicut et iuxta fabulas poetarum venti pinnas habere dicuntur, propter velocitatem scilicet.

[70] I am using poetas from the 1601 edition, which makes more sense than Bernd Roling's reading of poeticis at this point in the 2007 edition.

Bartholomew's attribution, sicut dicit Isidorus, suggests to a modern reader that the whole passage is a direct quote, but a quick comparison shows differences both small and large. He replaces Isidore's plural angeli with the singular throughout, and he uses synonyms for other words: nuncupatur for Isidore's vocantur, alas for pinnas, and tribuit for faciant. Bartholomew also adds words and phrases, especially for implied subjects, to make his source clearer, as in per angelorum ministerium divina voluntas populo nuntietur for Isidore's Domini voluntatem populis nuntiant (where angeli is implied), Spiritus autem semper est angelus for Isidore's Semper enim spiritus sunt (angeli implied again), or Cui scilicet angelo for Isidore's Quibus (i.e. angelis). But towards the end of this brief paragraph, Bartholomew felt the need to rewrite his source more thoroughly. Isidore here reads, in translation, "For this reason the license of artists makes wings [literally, feathers] for them, to signify their swift course on all their missions, just as in poetic fiction the winds are said to have wings to indicate their speed."[71] Bartholomew changed this passage to, "The license of artists has granted him, that is, the angel, wings, for in their sudden movement the aforesaid pictorial license demonstrates for the simple the swift operation of angels in a figurative manner, just as antiquity did not forbid poets to ascribe wings to the wind."

Here Bartholomew has liberally modified Isidore's text in several ways to make the description of angels in the Etymologiae more accessible to his 13th-century audience: Isidore's poets are now removed another six centuries further in the past, so for Bartholomew their writings come under the authority of antiquitas; Isidore's vague in cuncta is now unpacked in terms of scholastic theology as the angelorum operationem; and Bartholomew takes a witty, poetic turn of his own by personifying antiquitas in place of Isidore's typical and arid phrase [angeli] dicuntur. The most important addition, though, is Bartholomew's explanation of angel's wings as being a figura, or didactic image, constructed by poets for the purpose of educating the simplices. This is an idea wholly missing from Isidore's passage, and is indicative of how Bartholomew modified Isidore's writings for the training of mendicant preachers, who would themselves be searching for concrete ways to express religious truths to the simple and uneducated. This shift in purpose for the imagery of wings, from mere poetic license to a heuristic tool, also can explain why Bartholomew removed Isidore's concluding phrase, propter velocitatem scilicet. For Bartholomew, poets did not give wings to the wind simply as a suggestion of the wind's speed, but rather they are subsumed within a universalizing Christian tradition in which every worldly image is potentially, and foremost, a tool for understanding the faith.[72]

6 Isidore the Theologian in the Scholastic Age

By the high Middle Ages, Isidore's reputation was firmly cemented as a scholar of this world, of nature, of men, and of the arts. But he was also a saint, one revered particularly in his native Spain,[73] and his words were valued also in otherworldly matters. After the Etymologiae Isidore's two most popular works in the scholastic era were his Sententiae and Synonyma. The Sententiae, often called De summo bono in medieval manuscripts and catalogues,[74] is a compendium of concise statements, or "sentences," about moral and dogmatic theology, divided into three books covering 141 topics. Isidore was one of the founders of the genre of "sentences" in that the structure, topics, and sources he employed in constructing a manual of practical theology were widely emulated in later centuries.[75] This is especially evident during the 12th century in the teaching and writings of Anselm of Laon, Abelard, and Gilbert of Poitiers, among others, culminating with the Sententiae of Peter Lombard (*c.*1150–60).[76] According to Philipp Rosemann, "The arrangement of topics in [Isidore's] book I foreshadows the systematic order of later, much more advanced manuals of theology. Isidore first treats the properties of and knowability of God, as well as his eternity. … Like his Etymologiae, Isidore's Sententiae were one of the most frequently read books of the medieval period."[77] Isidore's Sententiae were also employed in other genres as diverse as exegetical commentaries, Gratian's Decretum, and the chronicle of Salimbene.[78]
